p. 797. HEARN v. HEARN & JARVIS. With regard to this Note it is desired to be made clear that, so far as the first point is concerned, DAVIES, J., was not insisting on a seal or rubber stamp on a copy of an order, but on some authentication, e.g., a signature by the clerk of the court of summary jurisdiction. The documents about which the judge was complaining were mere typewritten pieces of paper with no signature, seal, or anything else to show their origin. As to the second point, in the last two lines of the Note, if the solicitors get properly authenticated copies from the court of summary jurisdiction, then, of course, counsel can act on copies of these documents supplied by the solicitors, but there have been frequent cases of grave inaccuracies in the recital of proceedings in courts of summary jurisdiction in petitions, which are, of course, signed by counsel and sworn by the petitioner.

On the question whether there was condonation it is suggested that when Major Littledale ordered the appellant out of close arrest into open arrest and that he should resume his duties in the cook-house and that a summary of evidence should be taken, that meant condonation. This court, however, cannot see any evidence on which it can possibly be said that Major Littledale condoned the offence. Condonation means a wiping out or forgiveness of an offence in some way. The passage from CLODE to which our attention had been called states: "When any offence has been committed by an officer or soldier, and that offence not punished or forgiven, but advisedly overlooked, the person implicated being continued in his employment—these circumstances are held to be a good plea of condonation and a bar to further proceedings". In this case the appellant was informed that he was to remain in open arrest, that a summary of evidence would be taken, and that meanwhile he could continue or was to continue his duties. How can that be said to be a condonation of an offence of which Major Littledale, who had only just arrived at the camp, had any knowledge? It is difficult to understand how an offence can be condoned before it is known that it has been committed. In the present case, as there was no summary of evidence at the time Major Littledale told the appellant to resume his duties, it seems to the court that there was no evidence on which the first court-martial could find condonation. Therefore, the confirming officer was right in refusing to confirm the finding. In these circumstances, the plea of condonation could not have been successfully raised at the second trial, and, as there is no other ground on which it is suggested that the proceedings were in any way wrong, this appeal is dismissed."

Re HOLDER'S WILL TRUSTS. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD. v. HOLDER AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 16, 1953.]

Administration of Estates—Capital or income—National savings certificates encashed after death of holder.

D On June 12, 1940, a testator purchased five hundred units of national savings certificates, seventh issue, of 15s. each. On Sept. 21, 1951, the testator died, and his executor called in the certificates, receiving £534 7s. 6d., being £159 7s. 6d. more than their cost. By his will the testator declared that "no part of any dividends rents interest or moneys of the nature of income which shall actually be paid after my death shall be apportioned or treated as capital of my estate . . ." In a prospectus issued by the National Savings Committee relating to the said certificates it was stated: "A national savings certificate costs 15s. and becomes worth 20s. 6d. in ten years at the following rate of growth:—At the end of the first year 3d. interest is added; thereafter $\frac{1}{2}$ d. is added at the end of each completed period of one month up to the end of the tenth year. A bonus of 3d. is added at the end of the fifth year, and a further bonus of 6d. at the end of the tenth year. This represents a rate of interest of £3 3s. 5d. per cent. per annum over the whole period of ten years". The prospectus contained a statement of "Points to note" which referred to the fact that "no income tax is payable on the interest on certificates, and the interest they earn need not be included in any income tax return" and also to the fact that certificates might be cashed at any time "the owner receiving whatever interest is due".

H HELD: the sum received by the executor included an amount which in its inception was interest, but, having regard to the general tenor of the prospectus, there was an agreement between the testator, as purchaser of the savings certificates, and the government that, unless the testator encashed them, a sum was to be added to the principal value of the certificates each month, with the result that at the end of each completed month the addition was capitalised and could no longer be regarded as "dividends rents interest or moneys of the nature of income".

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (inter alia) as to the national savings certificates held by Ernest Cyril Coulthurst Holder, deceased, at the date of his death, and in respect of which £534 7s. 6d. was received after his death, including a total of £159 7s. 6d. representing interest, whether the whole or some and what part of such interest was payable to the beneficiaries entitled to income.

D. A. Ziegler for the plaintiff, the executor.

Plowman for the first defendant, interested in income.

N. S. S. Warren for the second defendant, interested in income.

T. A. C. Burgess for the remaining defendants, interested in capital.

ROXBURGH, J.: On June 12, 1940, the testator purchased five hundred units of national savings certificates, seventh issue, of 15s. each, which cost him £375. The testator might, of course, have encashed those savings certificates at any time on short notice, but in fact he did not do so. The normal span for certificates, of ten years, expired and they became subject to the provisions which the government made with regard to such certificates. On Sept. 21, 1951, the testator died. After his death, his executor, the plaintiff bank, called in the said certificates, and on Feb. 8, 1952, £534 7s. 6d. was received in respect thereof, of which £159 7s. 6d., according to the affidavit in support of this summons, represented interest. That payment was, of course, a lump sum of £534 7s. 6d. The statement that £159 7s. 6d. represented interest merely means that, if one deducts £375, the cost price, from £534 7s. 6d., the sum actually repaid, £159 7s. 6d., remains.

The testator included in his will a common form clause, which was borrowed, apparently, from some other document because it appears in his will with an erroneous number and plainly did not have regard to the special features of national savings certificates. By that clause he provided:

"13. I expressly declare that no part of any dividends rents interest or moneys of the nature of income which shall actually be paid after my death shall be apportioned or treated as capital of my estate and I declare that the whole thereof (whether the same be paid in respect of a period wholly or only partly prior to my death) shall belong to the person entitled to the investment or property from which the same respectively arose and if there shall be a tenant for life of such investment or property such dividend rent or interest shall be income payable to such tenant for life and I further declare that any bonus or bonuses which may from time to time be declared in respect of any shares or stock subject to the trusts hereof shall be applied as and be deemed to be income arising from such shares or stock."

Counsel for those interested in capital conceded that any interest earned by these national savings certificates after the death of the testator must be income. I think he was bound to concede that, although this was a lump sum payment, and there is no direction in this clause to "unscramble" lump sum payments. However, I think that he would have been in grave difficulty if he had not made that concession and, as he has made it, I need not say any more about that.

That national savings certificates earn income is beyond doubt. It is beyond doubt that, if they are not encashed, the income accumulates, and that accumulating interest, or accumulated interest, is not subject to income tax by virtue of the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 191. That does not solve my problem, for, in my judgment, the question is—and I regard it as a difficult question—whether that portion of the lump sum payment actually received by the bank after the testator's death comprised "any dividends rents interest or moneys of the nature of income". It did comprise moneys in the nature of income, unless they had been effectively capitalised by agreement between the testator and the government, i.e., the authority issuing the savings certificates, before his death, because they once had been in the nature of income. The question is whether they had been capitalised during his lifetime so as to lose the character of moneys of the nature of income,

That question is not made easier by some ambiguities in what I may call the prospectus of the seventh issue of national savings certificates, which obviously was intended to be couched in popular language and did not envisage this point. The material part of this prospectus is as follows:

"Put your savings into national savings certificates. See how they grow in value."

A There "they" must mean, in my view, the corpus, the amount of the certificates. Then:

"A national savings certificate costs 15s. and becomes worth 20s. 6d. in ten years at the following rate of growth."

B That must be the growth of the corpus. "At the end of the first year 3d. interest is added." That, I understand to mean, interest is deemed to be paid and is added to the corpus.

"Thereafter $\frac{1}{2}$ d. is added at the end of each completed period of one month up to the end of the tenth year."

There, again, I think that that must mean added to the corpus.

C "A bonus of 3d. is added at the end of the fifth year, and a further bonus of 6d. at the end of the tenth year."

I think that the bonus must be regarded as an income bonus in its inception, but there, again, it is, under the terms of issue, added to the corpus.

"This represents a rate of interest of £3 3s. 5d. per cent. per annum over the whole period of ten years."

D It is to be noticed that it says "This represents a rate of interest", which is not the same thing as saying "This is interest." Then comes a table headed: "The growth in value of savings certificates (seventh issue)." Again, that means surely, the growth in value of the corpus. The certificate costs 15s. and we see: "value after one year . . . 15s. 3d." Everything seems to me to point to the view that, unless the purchaser encashes his certificate, interest is deemed to be paid but added to the corpus by the agreement, between the purchaser and the government, embodied in the terms of issue.

On the back of the prospectus are "Points to Note". Point No. 2 is:

"No income tax is payable on the interest on certificates, and the interest they earn need not be included in any income tax return."

F That, of course, is a reference to what is now the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 191, but that does not affect the question, because there is no doubt that it is interest in its inception, in my judgment. The question is whether it has been, by agreement, capitalised before the testator's death.

G There are some provisions in the Savings Certificates Regulations, 1933 (S.R. & O., 1933, No. 1149), which indicate a point that is not in dispute with regard to interest, but there is nothing that I can find in that order which bears on the present question. At the end of "Points to Note" on the prospectus, however, there is one point which seems to me to be at variance with the general tenor of the prospectus. It is there stated:

H "5. After short notice, certificates may be cashed at any time provided the holder is not under seven years of age, the owner receiving whatever interest is due."

That points in the opposite direction, in my view. It points to the fact that the interest is never capitalised, or, in other words, that the arrangement is an agreement to pay interest at a rate referable to the intervening period, but payable only on the termination of the holding. In my judgment, that view, though it does receive support from point No. 5, is quite at variance with the whole of the rest of the tenor of the prospectus, and, though I think the point is difficult, in my judgment, there is an agreement between the purchaser of savings certificates of that issue and the government that, unless the holder encashes them, a sum shall be added to the principal month by month, with the result that at the end of each completed month the addition is capitalised, unless the holder before the end of the month calls for repayment.

Order accordingly.

R. v. FULHAM, HAMMERSMITH AND KENSINGTON RENT TRIBUNAL. Ex parte HIEROWSKI.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Parker, J.J.), April 21, 1953.]

Rent Control—Rent tribunal—Re-consideration of registered rent—Change of circumstances—Jurisdiction of tribunal—Receipt by landlord of war damage compensation—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 2 (3).

On June 21, 1949, on the reference of a tenant, a rent tribunal fixed the rent of a furnished flat at £6 6s. per week, which rent was registered by the local authority under s. 3 (2) of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. By an agreement dated May 24, 1952, a new tenant took possession of the flat at a rent of £6 10s. per week, the 4s. increase in the rent being made by the landlord in respect of an increase in the rates and other outgoings. In October, 1952, following breaches of covenant in the agreement of May 24, 1952, by the new tenant, the landlord claimed the right to re-enter the flat and determine the agreement. The tenant thereupon referred the contract to the tribunal to fix the rent payable for the flat. He alleged no change of circumstances under s. 2 (3) of the Act. The landlord, in his answer to the tenant's reference of the agreement to the tribunal, set out the fact that the rates and other outgoings had increased, and stated that when he had been informed by the clerk that he had overcharged the tenant 4s. per week (the registered rent being £6 6s. per week), he had refunded the amount due to the tenant. On Dec. 12, 1952, the tribunal ordered a reduction in the rent to £4 14s. 6d. per week. In doing so they treated the 4s. per week increase as a change of circumstances entitling them to deal with the whole matter at large, and they also took into consideration, as being a new factor, war damage compensation received by the landlord in respect of the premises. On an application for certiorari to bring up the order of the tribunal to be quashed,

HELD: the tribunal had jurisdiction to consider a reference under s. 2 (3) of the Act only if there had been a change of circumstances, whether alleged by the landlord or by the tenant; here no change of circumstances had been alleged, and the receipt by the landlord of the war damage compensation was entirely irrelevant and not a matter for the tribunal to take into consideration; and, therefore, the tribunal had never acquired jurisdiction and certiorari would go.

Per GODDARD, C.J.: All the tribunal could consider was the change of circumstances alleged—here the increase in the rates, which gave them no jurisdiction to re-open the question of the rent and further to reduce it.

Per LYNKEY, J., and PARKER, J.: The power of the tribunal was not limited to considering the change of circumstances alleged by the person applying for re-consideration of the rent. Once they had jurisdiction to deal with the reference, they were entitled to consider any change of circumstances, but not the whole case de novo, thus getting the right to review a decision which they thought was wrong.

MOTION for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of the Fulham, Hammersmith and Kensington Rent Tribunal, made on Dec. 12, 1952, reducing the rent of a furnished letting which had already been fixed by a previous decision of the tribunal, dated June 21, 1949.

- B The order of Dec. 12, 1952, was made on the reference of a new tenant and no change of circumstances was alleged by him. The grounds on which certiorari was sought were (i) that the tribunal had no jurisdiction under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, to make their decision, and (ii) that the tribunal, having, on June 21, 1949, reduced the rent from £7 per week to C £6 6s. per week, which rent was entered in the register kept by the local authority in pursuance of the Act of 1946, had no jurisdiction to reduce the rent further except on the grounds of change of circumstances which was at no time alleged and of which there was no evidence.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the landlord moves for an order of certiorari directed to the Fulham, Hammersmith and Kensington Rent Tribunal to bring up and quash a decision by which they reduced the registered rent of certain premises from six guineas a week to £4 14s. 6d. a week.

- E In June, 1949, these premises had been let furnished by the landlord to tenant at a weekly rent of £7. The tenant referred the contract to the tribunal under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and the tribunal reduced the rent to six guineas a week. That rent was entered in the register of the local authority under s. 3 (2) of the Act. Thereafter, the rates and other outgoings were increased, and the landlord sought to recoup himself by making a charge for the increased amounts which he had to pay. What he ought to have done was to have gone back to the tribunal and asked for a re-consideration on the ground of a change in circumstances, namely, the increased rates. Meanwhile, a new tenant, who had come into the premises referred the tenancy to the tribunal, but he alleged no change of circumstances under s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1946. It is clear, therefore, that, in the absence of a change of circumstances, and, I would add, a change of circumstances on which the tenant could rely, the case was entirely covered by R. v. Fulham, Hammersmith & Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Gormly (1), in which this court granted certiorari and quashed the decision of the tribunal where they had interfered with a rent which they had fixed. The court pointed out that, once the rent had been fixed, it could only be altered under the provisions of s. 2 (3) on the ground of change of circumstances.

- H When the landlord had to put in an answer to the tenant's reference, he set out the facts that the rates had gone up and that he had increased the rent by 4s. a week, but, meanwhile, he had refunded that 4s. a week to the tenant. Thereupon, the tribunal seem to have seized on that as a change of circumstances and proceeded on the tenant's application to reduce the rent from six guineas a week to £4 14s. 6d. a week. When one puts it in that way, one sees at once that it is impossible to construe the Act of Parliament in the way in which the tribunal did.

Section 2 (3) of the Act provides:

"Where the rent payable for any premises has been entered in the register in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change of circumstances, and the provisions of sub-s. (2) of this section shall apply on any such reference in like manner as they apply on a reference under sub-s. (1) of this section subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power to increase the rent payable."

That would give the tribunal power to increase the rent if the landlord applied on the ground of a change of circumstances. The only words we need consider are:

"it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change of circumstances . . ."

The tribunal have, apparently, taken the view, and counsel for the tribunal has strenuously argued on their behalf, that, once any change of circumstances is shown, the matter is at large for the tribunal to deal with as they like. Speaking for myself, if that were the construction which should be placed on this sub-section, it would be nothing more nor less than a trap, because a landlord who went to the tribunal and said:

"I ask you to re-consider this on the ground that there has been a rise in the rates", might suddenly be met with the whole case being re-opened and the tribunal saying:

"We are not going to increase the rent on the ground that the rates have gone up. Although the rates have gone up, we are going to put the rent down."

That seems to me to be a most astonishing proposition. The true construction, in my opinion, which should be placed on this sub-section is that all that the tribunal can consider is the change of circumstances alleged. They are to re-consider the rent on the ground of change of circumstances. The only change of circumstances existing here is the rise in the rates, which was not set up by the tenant, but was set up by the landlord. In considering the tenant's application, therefore, it followed that the only change of circumstances that had arisen since the rent had previously been fixed was the rise in rates, and, accordingly, the tribunal were limited to founding their jurisdiction on that matter. In my opinion, they had no power and no jurisdiction to regard this as a case in which the whole matter was at large so that they could inquire into whether they had fixed a proper rent on the previous occasion.

But there is another ground on which, in my opinion, the court is bound to grant certiorari. If it can be shown that an inferior tribunal has come to its decision by taking into account matters which it ought never to have taken into account and are virtually extraneous to what they have to decide, that is a ground for granting certiorari. The chairman, in his affidavit, has frankly stated that the tribunal acted as they did on grounds which appear to this court to be entirely irrelevant, quite apart from the fact that nobody asked them to act on those grounds and quite apart from the fact that this was not the complaint of the tenant. The ground the chairman has set out is this:

"Upon a comparison of the answers given to question (8) in the lessor's particulars (Form F.R.4A) on the present occasion and on the previous consideration by the tribunal it appeared to the tribunal that the matter of war damage compensation was a new factor. I had presided as chairman at the hearing by the tribunal of the application by the [previous tenant] and to the best of my recollection the matter of war damage had not been brought to the notice of the tribunal on that occasion. In the presence of the said Hierowski and the [present tenant] I there and then telephoned the surveyor's department of Hammersmith Metropolitan Borough Council and was informed by them that the damage claim approximated to £815 and the said Hierowski agreed that he had received this sum. This appeared to the rent tribunal materially to affect their decision as to what should be the appropriate rent of the premises under the said Act of 1946. While the tribunal have never considered it to be conclusive they nevertheless normally have had regard to the capital expenditure by a landlord on the provision of the accommodation under reference."

A

B The circumstances were these. The landlord bought the premises in a war-damaged condition. He received a sum of money and spent it on the premises for the purpose of repairing the damage. How the tribunal could come to the conclusion that it made any difference whatever where the money came from, whether the landlord took it out of his own pocket, or a friend lent it to him, or he recovered it from the War Damage Commission, I do not know, but that was a point which ought never to have been taken into consideration. It was entirely irrelevant to the matters which the tribunal had to consider, and as, on the face of the chairman's affidavit, it appears that that was one of the factors which operated on the tribunal in coming to the conclusion they did, it seems to me, on that ground also, that certiorari must go.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. Section 2 (3) reads:

"Where the rent payable for any premises has been entered in the register in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change of circumstances . . ."

E It seems to me that the natural meaning of those words is that the tribunal are given power to re-consider the rent on the ground of the change of circumstances, or, in other words, to re-consider the rent in the light of such change of circumstances, but it is suggested by the tribunal that the remaining words of the sub-section:

F " . . . and the provisions of sub-s. (2) of this section shall apply on any such reference in like manner as they apply on a reference under sub-s. (1) of this section subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power to increase the rent payable", in some way either qualify or extend the jurisdiction given to them by the first portion of the sub-section to re-consider the rent on the ground of change of circumstances. I do not so read that portion of the sub-section. It provides

G the machinery whereby the tribunal shall re-consider the rent on the ground of change of circumstances. The tribunal can only re-consider the rent if there is a change of circumstances, and they must adjust the rent in the light of that change of circumstances. But, speaking for myself, I would not limit their power to consider the change of circumstances to that change of circumstances which is alleged by the person applying for re-consideration, whether

H lessor, lessee or local authority. The tribunal are entitled, once they have jurisdiction to deal with the reference, to consider any change of circumstances, but their decision must be the result of considering a change of circumstances and not a re-decision on circumstances which existed when they first fixed the rent. In the present case it seems to me that the tribunal have gone far beyond their powers. There was no change of circumstances alleged, and, so far as I can see on the application before them, no person asked them to exercise their powers under s. 2 (3). I agree with my Lord that there should be certiorari.

PARKER, J.: I agree with both judgments delivered, and I would only add a word with regard to the construction of s. 2 (3). Counsel for the tribunal has contended that under that sub-section the tribunal have jurisdiction to consider the reference if there has been any change of circumstances, whether it is one which redounds to the benefit of the landlord or to the benefit of the tenant. He then goes on to argue that the tribunal, once they have jurisdiction, are entitled to consider, not only the change of circumstances, but the whole case de novo, thereby incidentally getting the right to review a decision which they feel is wrong. With regard to the first contention, I entirely accept that. It seems to me, that, in order that the tribunal should have jurisdiction—it matters not what the change of circumstances may be, whether, on a tenant's application, it be an increase in rates which are payable by the tenant, or, on a landlord's application, some other change which would be to the benefit of the tenant—once there is a change, there is jurisdiction. But as regards counsel for the tribunal's second contention, it seems to me contrary to the natural reading of the sub-section. In effect, he is forced to read the sub-section as if the words "on the ground of change of circumstances" qualify the referring of the case—in other words, that they mean only in the event of a change of circumstances. On the natural reading of the words the re-consideration which the tribunal are to make is one having regard to the change of circumstances, and to that alone. It is suggested that the reference thereafter to the provisions of sub-s. (2) of the section shows that the tribunal are really re-considering the whole case de novo. I certainly do not read it in that way; sub-s. (2) is only invoked as part of the machinery for determining the adjustment which is to be made having regard to the change of circumstances which has been proved. For these reasons, I agree that this order should go.

Order for certiorari.

CORSINI AND ANOTHER v. MONTAGUE BURTON, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), April 23, 24, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Compensation for goodwill—Carrying on business for five years—Need for business to be carried on by predecessors as tenants—Business carried on for part of period under friendly arrangement with previous tenant—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 4 (1).

From a date before September, 1947, the tenants' predecessors in title carried on the business of a restaurant under a friendly arrangement with the existing tenant of the premises. On Sept. 29, 1948, they were granted a tenancy of the premises for four years and continued to carry on the business. On Mar. 28, 1949, they sold the business and goodwill to the tenants and assigned the lease to them. On an application for a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5, the tenants claimed that they were entitled to compensation under s. 4 (1) as the business had been carried on by them or their predecessors in title at the premises for a period of not less than five years, within the meaning of the sub-section.

HELD: to comply with s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1927, the tenants had to show, not merely that they or their predecessors in title had carried on the business at the premises during the requisite period, but also that they had done so throughout the whole period in their capacity as tenants; as the tenants or their predecessors in title had not been the tenants of the premises for a period of not less than five years, they could not claim compensation under s. 4 (1); and, therefore, they were not entitled to a new lease under s. 5.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of His Honour JUDGE HOWARD, made at Southend County Court, and dated Feb. 18, 1953.

B Since Mar. 28, 1949, the tenants had been carrying on the business of a restaurant on the ground floor and in the cellar of a house known as 13 High Street, Southend, having on that day purchased the business and goodwill and taken an assignment of a four years' tenancy of the premises from two persons of the name of Alleck. The lease commenced on Sept. 29, 1948, but the Allecks had been carrying on the business of a restaurant at the premises for at least one year before that date under an arrangement with a Miss Wren who was then the tenant under an earlier agreement for three years. The tenants applied for a new lease of the premises under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5, and, to bring themselves within s. 4 (1) of the Act, they sought to prove that their predecessors had acquired Miss Wren's interest in the premises or were her sub-tenants from before September, 1947, but the learned county court judge found that there was merely a friendly understanding between Miss Wren and the Allecks which did not amount to a sub-letting or an assignment. The evidence of one of the witnesses showed that Miss Wren expected to obtain a long lease of the premises when her three years' agreement came to an end and wished to appropriate to herself, if she could, any benefit which might accrue from the carrying on at the premises of the business by the Allecks. The tenants further contended that, whether or not the Allecks had any interest in the premises before 1948, they (the tenants) came within s. 4 (1) as they or the Allecks had carried on the business at the premises for a period of over five years. The learned judge held that the tenants had not complied with the requirement of s. 4 (1), as they or their predecessors in title had not carried on the business as tenants of the premises for the requisite period, and, therefore, he dismissed the application.

F Merriton for the tenants.

G SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE HOWARD, sitting at Southend County Court, whereby he came to the conclusion that the tenants, who were making an application under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5, for the purpose of obtaining a new lease, had not brought themselves within the language of s. 4 (1) of the Act, as it was necessary for them to do. Section 4 (1) reads:

H "The tenant of a holding . . . shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner . . . be entitled, at the termination of the tenancy on quitting the holding, to be paid by his landlord compensation for goodwill if he proves to the satisfaction of the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years goodwill has become attached to the premises . . ."

Section 5 contains the provision that, in the circumstances there stated, a tenant may obtain, in lieu of compensation, a new lease. Section 25 (1) of the Act contains, inter alia, the following definition:

"The expression 'predecessor in title' in relation to a tenant or landlord means any person through whom the tenant or landlord has derived title, whether by assignment, by will, by intestacy, or by operation of law."

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, reviewed the evidence, and continued:] In my judgment, it is manifest that there was evidence on which the learned judge could hold, as he did, that there was never any legal contractual relationship which might lead to, or be the equivalent of, an assignment or an under-letting between Miss Wren and the Allecks. Counsel for the tenants, however, has taken a second point of some nicety, simplicity and ingenuity. It is, undoubtedly, the fact that the Allecks were the tenants' predecessors in title. Therefore, said counsel, as the Allecks had carried on the business at the premises from before September, 1947, the requirement of s. 4 (1) of the Act was satisfied, whether or not they had any interest in the premises before September, 1948. He pointed to the language of the sub-section which, he said, must, in accordance with well-known principles, be read in its ordinary sense. The requirement of s. 4 (1) is that the tenant should prove that he has a claim under the sub-section. It is not in doubt that one can aggregate the period during which the predecessor in title has carried on the business with the period during which the tenant himself has carried on the same business. Counsel for the tenants says that it is the fact, as proved, that for five years either the tenants or their predecessors in title, viz., the Allecks, carried on the business at the premises. In other words, substituting the names for the descriptions in s. 4 (1), he seeks to read the material part of the sub-section as follows: "if he proves that by reason of the carrying on by the tenants or the Allecks at the premises of a trade or business . . ." That is a simple and not unattractive point, but I have come to the conclusion that it is incorrect. I agree with the learned judge that the plain sense of the language is to require that the persons who carried on the business before the tenants must have been the tenants' predecessors in title and must have carried on the business as tenants, that is, having an interest in the premises during the whole of the relevant period. It seems to me that any other view would lead to an extraordinary result and render it inconsequent that the persons who carried on the business before the tenants should have had at any time any interest in the premises. It is plain, and it has, indeed, been laid down by this court in Williams v. Viscount Portman (1) and Pasmore v. Whitbread & Co., Ltd. (2), that the phrase "predecessors in title", having regard particularly to the definition in s. 25 (1), means predecessors in title to the premises, i.e., persons having the title to the premises to which the tenant has succeeded. It, therefore, necessarily follows that, to comply with s. 4 (1), the persons who carried on the business before the tenant must have had an interest in the premises immediately before the tenant took over. It would be an illogical and capricious result if they were only required to have it at that point of time, or for a period, however short, immediately prior thereto, but were not required to have any interest in the premises throughout the whole of the relevant period during which they carried on business. It is true that s. 4 (1) is concerned with giving compensation for goodwill (or its equivalent), but the goodwill is what is called an adherent goodwill, i.e., goodwill which has become attached to the premises so as to give them, in the market, a particular and increased value. It seems to me that the logic of the sub-section requires the combination both of a title in the premises and of the conduct of the business in order that the purposes of the Act may be satisfied. The point is a short one. It does not lend itself usefully to any attempt at elaboration. I am satisfied to express my concurrence with the learned county court judge and to adopt the way in which he expressed his conclusion. He said:

"... by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years . . ."

A "I think that on its true meaning [s. 4 (1)] means that the tenant must prove either that he as tenant has carried on business for five years, or that his predecessors in title in their capacity as tenants have carried on the business and the period during which he as tenant and the predecessors as tenants have carried on business is not less than five years."

That, in my judgment, is a correct statement of the meaning of the sub-section, and I am, therefore, unable to accept the contention of counsel for the tenants to the contrary. The result, in my judgment, is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

B BIRKETT, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. As SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said, the point is really not capable of elaboration, and I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

C ROMER, L.J.: I also agree, and only add a word or two on the second point. It seems to me that the argument of counsel for the tenants on that point really amounts to this, that, provided only that the predecessor of a tenant who makes a claim under s. 4 (1) of the Act had a title to the premises, from which title could and did derive to the tenant, it does not matter, for the purpose of fulfilling the five-years' requirement which is referred to in the sub-section, when the predecessor first acquired his title to the property, but it is enough to show that he was in actual occupation (and as to that I am not quite sure whether such occupation must be lawful or whether an unlawful occupation of the premises would be sufficient), and that he carried on the relevant business for the requisite time. In my judgment, that view attributes insufficient weight to the two words "in title" which follow on the word "predecessors". I think that when the legislature speaks of predecessors in title in this context it means, as a matter of construction, that those words must be attached to the word "predecessor" as a qualification throughout the whole period which is mentioned immediately afterwards. For the purposes of the five-years' period the legislature might have looked to title alone or (conceivably) to occupation alone. But, according to the contention of counsel for the tenants, it apparently looked to title alone at the date of the devolution from the predecessor of the tenant and also subsequently, but was content to look to either title or occupation, indifferently, at the earlier period of the predecessor's possession. That seems to me to be inherently improbable, and, if the legislature thought that mere occupation in conjunction with user were sufficient to form a foundation for a tenant's claim under s. 4 (1), it is not easy to see why it insisted on the possession of title at the time of devolution to the tenant. One would have thought that occupation would, on that hypothesis, have been a sufficient qualification both at that point of time and earlier. G Accordingly, as I have already said, I think that the words "in title" cover the whole five-years' period and that the phrase means what the learned judge said it meant, when he said that he thought

H "... on its true meaning [s. 4 (1)] means that the tenant must prove either that he as tenant has carried on business for five years, or that his predecessors in title in their capacity as tenants have carried on the business ..."

I quite agree with that. It has to be remembered that this is a landlord and tenant Act and it is not easy to see as a matter of logic or reason why there should be introduced into it an element which arose out of the possession of someone who was not a tenant, as was the position of the Allecks before September, 1948, in the present case. I quite agree with what my Lord has said. In my view, to satisfy a claim under s. 4 (1) it must be shown that there was a continuous chain of title throughout the period of five years to which the sub-section refers. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HOUSEHOLD v. GRIMSHAW (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), April 20, 21, 1953.]

Income Tax—Income—Payment of lump sum for cancellation of contract—

Contract for exclusive services—Operative for twelve to sixteen consecutive weeks of each of three successive years—Option to acquire film rights in novels—Not a contract of employment—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1, sched. D, Case II.

The taxpayer agreed to render exclusive and whole-time services to a film company in writing stories, treatments, adaptations, continuities and scenarios. The company was to have the sole property in the product of those services and all copyright, performing and other rights, and could use the work in any way it chose, but was not bound to use it. The taxpayer also granted to the company an option to acquire the film and certain other rights in any novel written by him during the subsistence of the agreement. For the taxpayer's "entire services hereunder and the products thereof and the rights to which [the company] is entitled hereunder" the company agreed to pay him £200 a week. The employment was to last twelve or sixteen consecutive weeks in each of three consecutive years commencing after the taxpayer's discharge from the army. During the remainder of each year the taxpayer was free to write and publish any works, but not for films except with the company's permission. Within a year of the commencement of the employment the agreement was cancelled by a deed of release, under which the taxpayer received £3,000 "in full satisfaction of all claims and demands" under the agreement. He was assessed to income tax under Case II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of this sum, less £300 paid to an agent.

HELD: (i) the contract was not a contract of employment, since the consideration of the payment of £200 a week was one consideration in respect both of the taxpayer's services and the grant of the option to acquire the film and other rights, and was not severable, and, therefore, the taxpayer was not assessable in respect of the payment of £200 a week under sched. E, and the £2,700 was not a sum paid in consideration of the abrogation of a contract of employment.

(ii) the £2,700 was not a payment in respect of a surrender of a capital asset, but income of the taxpayer's profession of author assessable under Case II of sched. D.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayer appealed against an assessment for 1947-48 under Case II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £1,500 in respect of his profession as an author, on the ground that a sum of £3,000, less agent's commission of £300, received by him should not be taken into account in computing the profits of his profession. He received the £3,000 under a deed of release terminating a contract of service for three years into which he had entered with a film company, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer British Studios, Ltd. (Metro), "in full satisfaction of all claims and demands" which he might have under the agreement against the company. He contended (i) that the cancelled agreement was a service agreement whereby he became an employee of Metro and that the £3,000 was consideration wholly or mainly for the cancellation of such service agreement; (ii) that the cancelled agreement was not a contract incidental to the normal course of the profession of author which the taxpayer carried on, or, alternatively, that the structure of the taxpayer's profession was radically altered by the cancellation of the agreement; and (iii) that the £3,000 was of a capital nature and ought not to be taken into account in computing the profits of his profession. The Crown contended (i) that the cancelled agreement was in part only a service agreement, the other essential part being an option whereby Metro was entitled to purchase film rights in novels and other writings of the taxpayer, and that the £3,000 was not paid wholly or mainly for the cancellation of the service agreement, but also for the cancellation of the other terms of the agreement; (ii) that the cancelled agreement was a mere engagement in the course of the taxpayer's profession of author and that its cancellation did not go to the whole structure or any substantial part of the structure of the taxpayer's profession; and (iii) that the £3,000 was merely incidental to the carrying on and realisation of the profits of the taxpayer's profession as an author and was properly taken into account. The commissioners held that the option to purchase the film rights was an essential part of the cancelled agreement, and that, therefore, the £3,000 was not paid wholly for the cancellation of the service agreement; that the cancelled agreement was a mere engagement in the course of the taxpayer's profession of author, that the cancellation of the agreement did not go to the whole structure or any substantial part of the structure of the taxpayer's profession and that the £3,000 was merely incidental to the carrying on, and the realisation of the profits of, that profession. They dismissed the appeal. The taxpayer appealed.

Cross, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

UPJOHN, J.: This appeal raises the question whether a sum of £2,700 net received by the taxpayer in 1946 in consideration of his agreement to the termination of what I may call a contract of service, intending thereby to use neutral language, which he had entered into with a film company, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer British Studios, Ltd., which I will call "Metro", in 1943 ought to be treated as a part of his income for 1947-48 under Case II of sched. D, or whether it ought to be treated as a capital receipt. The taxpayer has been engaged in the profession of author continuously since 1936, save when serving with His Majesty's Forces. He was a writer of short stories, and, before 1939, also wrote two novels which were published in the United States and in the United Kingdom. But up to the war he had not had any contact with any film company and had sold no film rights in any of his novels or short stories. He joined the army on the outbreak of war, and, while he was serving in the Middle East, an agent on his behalf entered into an agreement dated Dec. 31, 1943, with Metro. He entered into this agreement with some reluctance, but he realised that it afforded a valuable means of securing his financial position while he was re-establishing himself in his profession as an author.

By cl. 2 of the agreement:

"Metro hereby employs the [taxpayer] to render and the [taxpayer] hereby agrees to render to Metro his exclusive services in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland Eire and in Europe only in accordance with Metro's directions and instructions and either alone or in conjunction or collaboration with any other person appointed by Metro in writing and composing stories treatments adaptations continuities scenarios."

By cl. 3 (3):

"Metro will pay to the [taxpayer] the sum of £10 per week as from July 20, 1943, until the commencement of the employment."

Then it was provided that the taxpayer should not be bound to account for or repay this sum of £10 a week unless he broke the agreement, when it should become repayable, but the payment was

"in advance and on account of the purchase price of the first of the [taxpayer's] novels in respect of which Metro exercises its option" under a later clause in the agreement. By cl. 3 (6):

"The term of the employment shall be a minimum period of twelve consecutive weeks in each of the three consecutive years commencing from the commencement of the employment."

The employment was to begin as soon as the taxpayer could obtain his discharge from the army on the cessation of hostilities, or, at the latest, three months after such discharge. It was further provided that the period of twelve consecutive weeks in each year might be extended by Metro for a further four weeks following consecutively on the twelve weeks in any year if they desired so to do. Clause 4 provided:

"All products of the [taxpayer's] services to Metro and all copyright performing right and all other rights therein throughout the world during the full term of copyright and all renewals and extensions thereof shall be the sole property of Metro who shall be deemed in law to be the sole author thereof (the [taxpayer] acting entirely as Metro's employee) and the [taxpayer] shall at the request and cost of Metro make execute and do all acts deeds and things necessary or proper for the purpose of vesting and warranting all such rights in and to Metro."

By cl. 6:

A "Metro shall have the right to add to take from change adapt translate into and use and treat in every way and in all or any languages the products of the [taxpayer's] services and either alone or in conjunction with material taken or adapted from the work of any other person and/or other source in all respects as Metro in its sole discretion shall think fit but shall not be bound to make any use of the products of the [taxpayer's] services."

B It was then provided that, if Metro did make use of them, the taxpayer was entitled to what was called the customary screen credit. Clause 8 provided that during the employment—i.e., during the twelve or sixteen weeks in each year—the taxpayer was to devote the whole of his time and attention to rendering services to Metro, but he was to be entitled to work at home provided he attended Metro for conferences and discussions as and when required by Metro during normal business hours. Then, during the period of three years, the taxpayer undertook that he would not

C "(i) write any literary works dramatic works stories treatments adaptations continuities scenarios scripts and/or dialogue for films or (ii) render any other services for films to or for himself or any person (except Metro) in any part of the world without the previous consent in writing of Metro."

D By cl. 9:

E "Subject to the due and punctual performance and observance of the terms and conditions on the part of the [taxpayer] in this agreement contained Metro shall pay to the [taxpayer] for his entire services hereunder and the products thereof and the rights to which Metro is entitled hereunder a sum at the rate of £200 per week payable weekly during the employment the first weekly payment to be made seven days after the commencement of the employment."

Clause 13 provides:

F "In consideration of the premises (i) The [taxpayer] hereby grants and agrees to grant to Metro the option to acquire the rights hereinafter mentioned of and in each novel written by the [taxpayer] which is published after the date of this agreement and prior to the expiration of the said three consecutive years . . ."

G The price for the rights was to be £6,000 in respect of the first novel, £7,000 for the second, £8,000 for the third, and so on. The rights, putting it briefly, were "motion picture television broadcasting and ancillary rights". Metro was given the option of continuing the whole agreement, that is to say, relating to his service of twelve to sixteen weeks in each year and the option for a further period of two years consecutive on the expiration of the first three years on the same terms. Finally, it was provided that the agreement was to be construed according to the law of England.

H The taxpayer secured his release from the army in 1945, and, as required by the agreement, he duly notified Metro of that fact. As it was bound to do, Metro gave him employment which started in 1945 and lasted for the minimum period of twelve weeks. He was asked to and did write an original script of a film version of a play he had long had in mind. In March, 1946, Metro informed the taxpayer that, owing to a change in its plans and a substantial reorganisation, it would have no work for him, and, although it was willing to continue to employ him in accordance with the contract if he insisted on it, it was anxious to be released from its bargain and asked him what sum he wanted to be paid for such a release. The taxpayer was not at all keen to be released. Indeed, it is stated in the Case that:

“The [taxpayer] was disappointed and angry at Metro’s suggestion, but realised that Metro could make his life miserable if he refused to agree to a cancellation.”

The desire for cancellation was entirely one-sided, but the taxpayer, sensibly enough, agreed to it on terms.

Those terms are contained in an agreement made on Sept. 11, 1946, which recited that he had received £1,168 6s. 8d. on account of the payments of £10 a week. He was to keep that sum unless Metro exercised the option contained in the agreement to purchase the film rights of any novel, in which case, as in the earlier agreement, he had to bring that sum into account as part of the purchase price. By cl. 1, in consideration of £3,000 paid by Metro to the taxpayer, each party released the other from all obligations under the agreement of 1943. By cl. 2:

“In consideration of the sum of 5s. now paid by [Metro] to the [taxpayer] . . . the [taxpayer] hereby grants and agrees to grant unto [Metro] the exclusive option to acquire by way of partial assignment of the copyright all photoplay rights in and throughout the world during the full term of copyright and all renewals and extensions thereof of his next three novels of not less than seventy thousand words or dramatic works or either of them . . .”

The price was to be as in the earlier agreement, £6,000 for the first novel, £7,000 for the second, and so on. This option agreement was in fact substantially identical with the option terms in the earlier agreement, save that the option was confined to the first three novels which might be produced by the taxpayer and not to any novels that he might produce during the currency of the earlier agreement. The photoplay rights to be assigned were, as in the earlier agreement, motion picture, television, broadcasting and ancillary rights.

By reason of that agreement, £3,000 was paid to the taxpayer, of which a sum of £300 was paid to an agent, and the question arises whether the sum of £2,700 should be treated as income assessable under Case II of sched. D, or whether it is a capital payment. Paragraph 10 of the Stated Case states:

“Since the date of the said deed of release, the [taxpayer] has never entered into any similar agreement with Metro or any other film company. He has not banished from his mind the possibility of obtaining a film contract, but he would now only consider the direct sale of film rights in a book or short story, as there is now a large market for his short stories both in the United Kingdom and the United States. He has not in fact sold any rights in any of his books to Metro or to any other film company, but he did subsequently sell the rights in a short story to a film company, in circumstances not otherwise material to this case.”

Two main arguments have been presented to me. The first depends on the answer to this question: Ought the remuneration of £200 a week for the minimum period of twelve weeks in each of the three years to be assessed for income tax purposes under sched. E on the footing that the contract is a contract of employment, or ought it to be assessed under Case II of sched. D on the ground that it was a profit of the profession or vocation carried on by the taxpayer as author at the material time? It is conceded in this court that, if the taxpayer establishes that the remuneration is assessable under sched. E, having regard to the decision in Henley v. Murray (1), the case must be concluded in the taxpayer’s favour. But the Crown reserves the right to challenge that authority should this case go higher. That is the first main question. If, however, the decision is against the taxpayer, and the remuneration ought to have been assessed under Case II of sched. D, a question still arises whether in the circumstances of this case the payment he received in 1946 ought to be subject to tax, or whether it ought to be regarded as a capital payment.

A On the first point, whether this contract is to be regarded as a contract of employment and assessable under sched. E, the taxpayer puts his case in this way. He says: "Look at this agreement, particularly at cl. 2, cl. 4, cl. 6 and cl. 8, and you find that it is something entirely outside the scope of the profession or vocation of an author, because it bound the taxpayer for a minimum period of twelve weeks in each year hand and foot to Metro". He was not merely to produce novels. He had to produce, either alone or in collaboration, as he might be directed, such stories, treatments, adaptations, continuities and scenarios as he might be directed. Having done that, Metro could make such use of his work as it pleased. Metro might make no use of it at all. Metro might alter it, adapt it and treat it in any way it pleased. It is said that that falls entirely outside the conception of the work or profession or vocation of an author.

B In my judgment, this point is not open to the taxpayer. It is not for this court in a case such as this to decide, in the absence of evidence, what is or is not within the scope of the vocation of an author. There may, indeed, be some cases so plain and obvious that no evidence is required. Such a case is Bury & Walkers v. Phillips (2) where it was held that it was no part of the business of a solicitor as such to lend money to his clients. That was a simple and obvious case, but here I am left completely in the dark as to what is the true ambit of an author's vocation or profession. No evidence was called on that matter before the Special Commissioners, and there is no finding on it. D In my judgment, it is not open to the taxpayer to take that point before me.

E The taxpayer's argument, however, proceeds that, even if that be so, nevertheless this was a contract of employment. Counsel for the taxpayer points out rightly that one may carry on at the same time both a profession and an employment which is assessable under sched. E, even though the profession is of precisely the same character as the employment. That that may be so in proper circumstances, I think, cannot be doubted, and it is well illustrated in Davies v. Braithwaite (3), in which ROWLATT, J., said ([1931] 2 K.B. 635):

"For instance, a musician who holds an office or employment under a permanent engagement can at the same time follow his profession privately."

F The Crown, however, say that, properly regarded, this contract is not one of employment, and they put their case in two ways. First, it is said that under the agreement of 1943 the taxpayer is to give his personal services for a minimum period of twelve weeks in each year for three years. He is also to give an option for the same period to Metro to acquire the film rights in any novel or other work which he may produce in his own time. He is also under certain restrictions G about giving any works to any other film companies, and as to secrecy. The consideration for those obligations on the part of the taxpayer is one entire consideration—that he is to be paid £200 a week for twelve weeks in each year. It is said that this figure cannot be split or apportioned, and, when the matter is looked at closely, this is not a contract of employment, but a contract whereby the taxpayer is exercising his vocation as author partly by giving services H and partly by giving an option over his literary products. It is said that the fact that Metro's consideration cannot be split into two parts shows conclusively that it cannot be an employment under sched. E.

On the other hand, the taxpayer submits that, on the true construction of the agreement, it is severable into two distinct parts, £200 a week being consideration for performing the services for the twelve weeks in each year, and the payment of £10 a week from July, 1943, onwards and the other provisions being consideration applicable if Metro exercised the option. Not unnaturally, he refers me to a letter of Mar. 1, 1946, which he said shows where the agreement was severable. On the whole, however, I cannot accept the taxpayer's submission on that matter. Looking at cl. 9 and cl. 13 it seems to me clear that the consideration of £200 a week given by Metro is one consideration in respect of the taxpayer's services and option grant. In my judgment, on its true construction, this cannot be construed as a contract of employment. It is a contract entered into by the author partly to give an option on his activities as an author and partly to give services for some twelve to sixteen weeks in any year. A

But the Crown submits that, even if the contract be regarded as severable, nevertheless, it ought to be regarded, not as a contract of employment, but as a mere engagement entered into by the taxpayer in the course of carrying on his professional activity as an author. The Crown referred me to Higgs v. Olivier (4), where SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said ([1952] Ch. 318): B

"In this case the Special Commissioners concluded that the £15,000 was not within the taxing provisions I have quoted. 'We found it impossible to say that the sum of £15,000 under the deed came to the taxpayer as part of the income from his vocation. On the contrary, it came to him for refraining from carrying on his vocation, and in our opinion was a capital receipt'. I agree that in questions of this kind which involve a consideration of the true import and scope of the trading provisions, it is not possible to say that the whole matter is one of fact. It is, I think, a question of mixed law and fact. But I think that, if I am right in saying that in such a case as this it may well be a matter of degree, then so long as it does not appear that the Special Commissioners have misapprehended the effect of the taxing provisions their decision should not be disturbed. That was HARMAN, J.'s first approach to this case, and I am of the same opinion." C

The Crown say that, looking at the conclusions, admittedly of mixed law and fact here, one finds that the Special Commissioners have come to the conclusion that this is, not a contract of employment, but an engagement entered into in the course of carrying on the activities of an author. It is said, relying on the passage I have just quoted from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, that the finding ought not to be disturbed unless I am clearly of opinion that it was wrong. D

The relevant passage in the Stated Case is in these terms: E

"We also hold that the said agreement [of 1943], though it did involve an engagement, and in one sense of the word an employment, was a mere engagement in the course of the [taxpayer's] profession of author. (Compare ROWLATT, J., in Davies v. Braithwaite (3) (18 Tax Cas. 204). Indeed we think that in one important respect the [taxpayer's] case is weaker than was the case of Miss Lilian Braithwaite, in that while each of her 'posts' was full time, while it lasted, the [taxpayer] was free for a minimum of thirty-six weeks in each of the three years covered by his agreement with Metro, to pursue his profession as author as he pleased, saving only Metro's option in the film rights of his writings." F

I do not think that the example given by the Special Commissioners is a very happy one. If they were going to make that point, it would at least have been right, in my judgment, to have pointed out that, in some respects, the taxpayer's case was much stronger, for during the period of employment of twelve weeks he was bound hand and foot as a mere servant or tool of Metro and had to carry out every literary duty laid on him as Metro pleased. Nevertheless, on the whole, I think that the Special Commissioners came to a correct conclusion on this matter, and I am not prepared to disturb their decision. It follows that, on the first main question, the remuneration under the agreement of G H

1943 is assessable, not under sched. E, but as part of the earnings of the author in the course of his profession or vocation under Case II of sched. D.

A The second main question is this. Notwithstanding that the taxpayer was carrying on in essence his vocation or profession of an author, does that fact preclude him from treating this sum of £2,700, which he received in the course of carrying on that profession as consideration for the termination of the agreement of 1943, as capital? The general rule, as I have pointed out, under sched. E is, so far as this court is concerned, clear. The sum received as consideration for the termination of an agreement, at all events where the termination is one-sided in its inception, is a capital receipt. No clear rule appears to be laid down where a contract is terminated in the course of carrying on a trade or profession assessable under Case II of sched. D. No doubt, where a trading company is carrying on a trade, for instance such as building ships, and one or two of the persons for whom the ships are being built desire to be relieved of their bargains, money received as damages for breach of contract for failure to take delivery of the ship must be treated as a trade receipt for the purposes of income tax. That is plain from Short Bros., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. Sunderland Shipbuilding Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), a decision of the Court of Appeal.

C On the other hand, there are cases where a different result has been reached, in particular, Barr, Crombie & Co. v. Inland Revenue (6) before the First Division of the Court of Session. That each case must depend on its own facts is clearly shown by the judgment of the Lord President (LORD NORMAND), who said (1945 S.C. 276):

D "It has been truly said that every case must be considered on its own facts, and that no legal criterion for distinguishing between capital payments and income payments is readily applicable. Therefore, though we have had a considerable citation of cases, I do not propose to refer to more than a few of them. LORD CAVE, L.C., in British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (7) said ([1926] A.C. 213): 'But when an expenditure is made,
E not only once and for all, but with a view to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade, I think that there is very good reason (in the absence of special circumstances leading to an opposite conclusion) for treating such an expenditure as properly attrib-
F utable not to revenue but to capital'. And, of course, one may equally say that an expenditure made once and for all as payment for abandoning or surrendering an asset is received by the recipient as a capital and not as a revenue payment, in the absence of any indication to the contrary. In the present case virtually the whole assets of the appellant company con-G sisted in this agreement. When the agreement was surrendered or abandoned, practically nothing remained of the company's business. It was forced to reduce its staff, to transfer into other premises, and it really started a new trading life. Its trading existence as practised up to that H time had ceased with the liquidation of the shipping company. The proportions of its profits, to which I have referred, demonstrate that. It is therefore an entirely different case from Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Inland Revenue (8). I regard the payment here as a payment made in the sense of LORD CAVE's observations 'once and for all', and received by the appellant company as the price of the surrender of its only important capital asset. In Kelsall Parsons (8), on the other hand, the payment was in return for the loss of a single agency out of about a dozen agencies carried on by the company, and the fact that the payment in that case did not represent the whole capital assets of the company is easily shown by the fact that in the year after the surrender of the single agency profits were no less than they had been the year before the surrender. There is another distinction between the Kelsall Parsons case (8) and the present, which is not conclusive, but is, I think, sometimes helpful. Here we are not dealing with a single payment in return for the surrender of the prospect of making profits in the final year of the agreement, but with a payment for the surrender of an agreement while there was still a substantial period—indeed, more than half of the period of the agreement—to run, and a period which extended to many years of accountancy for the purposes of this company's business."

Pausing there for a moment, it is, of course, plain here that the agreement had only run one-third of its minimum course.

"Then, again, to apply what was said by LORD MACMILLAN in Van den Berghs, Ltd. v. Clark (9) ([1935] A.C. 442), it is manifest that, after the liquidation of the shipping company and the payment to the appellant company of this sum of money, the structure of the company was radically affected and its whole character as a business was decisively altered. Though each one of the distinctions may be in itself indecisive, and though each is open to criticism, yet juncta juvant. And where you have a payment for the loss of the contract upon which the whole trade of the company has been built, where the expected profits of the contract are used to measure the loss of them for a period of future years, and where in consequence of the loss the company's structure and character are greatly affected, the payment seems to me to be beyond doubt a capital payment. For these reasons, therefore, I think that the question of law ought to be answered in the negative. So much for the income tax aspect of the case."

LORD MONCRIEFF said this (ibid., 277):

"I am of the same opinion and have little to add. In cases such as this, which are so dependent each upon its own complicated circumstances, it is not possible to get much guidance by way of comparison from the decisions in other related cases. I think, however, that a general guide for application in all such cases is to be found in the passage from LORD CAVE's speech in British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (7) ([1926] A.C. 213), as approved in the subsequent case of Van den Berghs, Ltd. v. Clark (9) ([1935] A.C. 439) by LORD MACMILLAN, in which he indicated that, when the transaction takes the form of a transfer from one party to another of something that has formed part of the enduring trading assets of one of them, any such transfer for a price points rather to a transaction on capital than on revenue account. That that was the nature of the present case is amply demonstrated by the few findings of fact which are contained in the case itself. This particular agency contract was the real stock-in-trade of the appellant company. The percentages show how little else of value would have been available to them for transfer as part of their goodwill, and it seems to me accordingly that it is manifest on the findings of the case that, had they desired to bring their business to a sale, the asset which would have earned a price would have been this agency contract and practically nothing else."

I think those passages are sufficient to show, first, the difficulty of coming to a conclusion on this matter, and, secondly, that that was a very different case from this one.

Bush, Beach & Gent, Ltd. v. Road (10) was cited by counsel for the Crown in support of his submission that the mere fact that, as found in the Stated Case, the contract with Metro was in a sense unique and special of its own kind, is not in any way conclusive. The facts ([1939] 3 All E.R. 304) show that, before the contract in respect of which a payment for termination was made, the business of the appellant company was that of merchants of industrial chemicals:

"Up to 1933 their business had been confined to industrial chemicals. In 1933 they entered into a contract for the purchase of agricultural chemicals, which, by the contract, were to be sold only in certain parts of the country, the sellers undertaking to debar all their other buyers from selling the same chemicals in those parts of the country. For the purposes of this contract the appellants set up a new sales organisation."

A Later on it is said that the agreement was terminated by a payment from Chemimetals, Ltd. of £4,750, and the question was whether that sum fell to be brought into tax by the appellant company. LAWRENCE, J., said (ibid.):

"The appellants contended before the commissioners and now contend, (i) that the selling of industrial and agricultural chemicals were two separate and distinct branches of the appellant company's business, (ii) that the cancellation of the contract destroyed the whole of their business in agricultural chemicals, and that the sum of £4,500 was paid by way of agreed compensation for the loss of that business, and, (iii) that the sum of £4,500 was paid by way of compensation for sterilisation of a capital asset. It was further argued that the appellants had, by the contract, established for themselves not only a source of supply but also a market, that the sale of agricultural chemicals was a new and profitable field, and that, in view of the agreement not to supply competitors, the contract was a capital asset, and the payment for its cancellation was, therefore, capital. In my opinion, the present case is more closely analogous to cases such as Short Bros., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5) and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Northfleet Coal & Ballast Co., Ltd. (11) than to cases such as Van den Berghs, Ltd. v. Clark (9). The sum paid, in my view, represented profits which the appellants would or might have made under the contract, and not the purchase price of the contract itself . . ."

That certainly is an observation which is applicable to this case.

"Nor do I accept the argument that the structure of the appellant company was affected by the contract or its cancellation as in Van den Berghs, Ltd. v. Clark (9). The appellant company could always have sold agricultural chemicals, and it can still do so. The contract was made in the ordinary course of the company's business, although in a new field, and the exclusion of competition is an ordinary incident of such contracts, and not, as it seems to me, analogous to a pooling agreement . . . Here no money was paid to secure the contract in question, and the money paid for its cancellation was not a repayment of any such money, but must have been a payment in respect of the profits to have been earned under the contract. I am therefore of opinion that the commissioners' decision was right, and the appeal is dismissed with costs."

This matter is not free from difficulty. It was naturally submitted to me by counsel for the taxpayer that this contract was of outstanding, and, indeed, unique, importance to the taxpayer. The sole reason for his reluctant entry into the agreement was to give him financial security while he was re-establishing himself as an author. This, it was said, was in the nature of a capital asset which he agreed to surrender for the sum of £2,700. On the whole, I do not think that that is the correct way of looking at this matter. It seems to me that here was an author coming back from the war, seeking to re-establish himself in his vocation. For nine months of every year he was at liberty to carry on his vocation as an author without any restriction whatever, except that, in respect of any novels that he might produce, he had to offer the film rights during the currency of the agreement to Metro. True, for three months of the year he secured a valuable, and, indeed, very lucrative, employment with Metro, but I cannot regard this contract as being in any sense a capital asset such as was the case in Barr, Crombie & Co. (6). The capital asset which the taxpayer has in this case is his own brain, talents and flair as an author and not this agreement, although it provided him with a very convenient remuneration to tide him over during the early period of re-conversion to civilian life. Accordingly, in my judgment, this appeal fails.

It was also submitted to me by counsel for the Crown that the payment of the £3,000 for the release of rights under the agreement of 1943 was made partly for the rights granted under cl. 2 of the agreement of 1946, that is to say, part of the consideration was for the re-granting of the options. In my judgment, that point is not open to the Crown in this case. I think the Special Commissioners misdirected themselves when they said, in para. 14 (3):

"Although, as is admitted on behalf of the Crown, the [taxpayer] did enter into a contract of service with Metro, we hold that on a proper construction of the agreement the option given to Metro to purchase during the term of the agreement the film rights of the [taxpayer's] novels was an essential part of the bargain between them . . ."

I do not quarrel with that, but I do with what follows:

"... and it follows that the sum paid under the deed of release was not by any means wholly paid for the abrogation of the service agreement."

That is a complete non sequitur.

Clause 2 of the agreement of 1946 provides for what is virtually a re-granting of the options for the sum of 5s. There was no cross-examination of the taxpayer, who gave evidence before the Special Commissioners, to disturb the accuracy of that statement to be found in the agreement. Therefore, in the absence of any evidence that the consideration in cl. 2 of the agreement was wrongly stated, in my judgment, it was not open to the Special Commissioners to make a finding of fact to that effect. In truth, the consideration may well have been correctly stated. The taxpayer had received the sum of £1,168 under the agreement of 1943, and he might well have thought it only fair, and have been willing, to give an option to the company to buy the film rights for the substantial sums contained in the new agreement for a nominal consideration. I mention this in case this case should go further and it should be thought material, but in the circumstances, it does not affect my decision. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Re A SOLICITOR. Re TAXATION OF COSTS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.J.J.), April 30, 1953.]

Solicitor—Costs—Need to deliver detailed bill—Non-contentious business—Charge of gross sum including disbursements—Discretion of court to order delivery of detailed bill—Solicitors Act, 1932 (c. 37), s. 64, s. 66—Solicitors' Remuneration (Gross Sum) Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 548), art. 1.

The executors named in a will instructed solicitors to act in the winding-up of the estate. In July, 1949, the solicitors delivered to the executors a document, headed: "In the estate of [E.L.E.], deceased. Statement of receipts and payments", in which the sum for "legal charges and disbursements on extracting probate, administration of estate, assents and negotiating surrender of . . . leases" was shown as £735, of which sum there was shown a balance owing by the executors to the solicitors of £260 9s. 7d. On Oct. 1, 1949, that balance was paid. On Aug. 12, 1952, the executors requested an itemised bill, and the solicitors delivered a document dated Aug. 13, 1952, setting out five headings of work done, together with an item for disbursements amounting to £19 10s. 6d. On an originating summons by the executors for taxation of the bill dated Aug. 13, 1952, and, alternatively, for delivery of a detailed bill of charges,

HELD: the Solicitors' Remuneration (Gross Sum) Order, 1934, art. 1, was concerned with remuneration and nothing in the order justified a solicitor charging a lump sum to cover both remuneration and disbursements, and, as the figure of £735 covered, not only legal charges, i.e., profit costs and remuneration, but also disbursements, that item did not fall within the terms of the order, and, in the exercise of its jurisdiction under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 64 (1), the court would make an order for the delivery of an itemised bill.

APPEAL by executors against an order of VAISEY, J., in chambers dated Feb. 16, 1953.

The testator, Edgar Louis East, who died on June 15, 1946, by his will appointed his wife, Flora Grace East, and his son, Edgar Wilfred East, to be his executors and the trustees of his estate. The executors instructed Messrs. Thorpe & Co., who subsequently became Messrs. Percy Walker & Co., solicitors, to conduct the legal business of winding-up the estate. In July, 1949, the solicitors sent to the executors a document headed: "In the estate of Edgar Louis East, deceased. Statement of receipts and payments," which showed the sum of £735 as the legal charges due to the solicitors, of which the balance of £260 9s. 7d. was still owing. On Oct. 1, 1949, the executors paid the balance to the solicitors, and on Aug. 12, 1952, they asked the solicitors for an itemised bill. The solicitors prepared a document dated Aug. 13, 1952, setting out under five headings the work performed by them with a lump sum charge against each head. By an originating summons dated Dec. 5, 1952, the executors prayed that the bill dated Aug. 13, 1952, be referred to the taxing officer to be taxed, and, further or alternatively, that the solicitors be ordered to deliver to them a detailed bill of charges pursuant to the Solicitors' Remuneration (Gross Sum) Order, 1934, art. 1. On Feb. 16, 1953, VAISEY, J., in chambers dismissed the summons and the executors appealed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal from an order made by VAISEY, J., rejecting the application of the executors for an order, among other things, for delivery of a bill of costs by the solicitors. The solicitors were engaged to conduct the legal business necessary in the winding-up of the testator's estate. That they did, and there is no question that they did it properly, and in July, 1949, the executors received from them a document, headed: "Edgar Lewis East, deceased. Statement of receipts and payments". On the left hand side is a number of payments beginning with a payment for rates and including such matters as payments for tax and estate duty and a payment to another firm of solicitors for surrender of the leases of certain properties—the "Bentham Road" properties—an item, which amounted to £1,022 18s. 11d. The last item on the left hand side was expressed thus: "To Messrs. Percy Walker & Co., legal charges and disbursements on extracting probate, administration of estate, assents and negotiating surrender of the Bentham Road leases £735". On the right hand side of the document appeared a number of receipts, including the proceeds of sale of investments, dividends, and returned estate and legacy duty. The receipts, however, did not amount to as much as the outgoings, so that the last item on the right hand side is a balance figure expressed thus, "Balance of account due to Messrs. Percy Walker & Co., £260 9s. 7d." The executors were satisfied with the account as delivered and they paid the £260 9s. 7d. by cheque to the solicitors. Indeed, it appears that thereafter they continued to instruct the solicitors in other matters. I gather also that the estate of the testator was so disposed of that during her life the widow has a limited interest so that, in a sense, the conduct of the affairs of the estate is not concluded. In 1951 the son, the male executor, found himself in the position of being the executor of the will of somebody else who had died. That estate was not so large as his father's, but in the second case the legal charges of the solicitors acting were very much less than the figure of £735 which appeared in the document to which I have referred. This executor thereupon expressed to the solicitors his doubts whether the figure which had been charged, and paid, was a proper figure, and he asked to be supplied with details to justify it. On Aug. 13, 1952, the solicitors made out a document which was in form a bill, though it was not delivered as such. This document showed under some five headings the various main subject-matters with which they had dealt on behalf of the executors with lump sums against each head, the effect of the document, broadly, being that when the permitted fifty per cent. increase was added to the remuneration and a sum of approximately £20 for disbursements had also been added, the total charge would have been, if delivered in accordance with this document, £887 9s. That shows on the face of it that the figure put in the first document was appreciably less than the actual sums which the firm could have charged if they had strictly adhered to their rights under the Solicitors Act, 1932, and the orders made thereunder. The executors, however, were still not satisfied with the matter, and they have, therefore, started the present proceedings with a view to obtaining an itemised bill, and, I take it, having obtained the bill, to having it taxed.

The question which is raised in the case turns on the language and proper interpretation of the order made under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 56, known as the Solicitors' Remuneration (Gross Sum) Order, 1934. So far as relevant, the order proceeds as follows:

"1. Without prejudice . . . to the powers conferred upon the solicitor or the party chargeable with the bill under s. 66 of the Solicitors Act, 1932, the remuneration of a solicitor in respect of all business regulated by cl. 2 (c) of the General Order of 1882, as amended by any subsequent general order may at the option of the solicitor be by a gross sum in lieu of by detailed charges: Provided that within six months after delivery of a charge made under this order whether it has been paid or not, the client may require that a detailed bill of charges shall be delivered . . .”

A The matter, as it was argued before VAISEY, J., turned, as I follow it, on whether the inclusion of the last item on the left hand side of the first document amounted to a “delivery of a charge” within the meaning of the order which I have read, for if it did, then manifestly on the facts the client had not required the delivery of a detailed bill within the period stated in the order. The client not having exercised his privilege, it was contended on the solicitors’ behalf that it was too late to come now, after three years, and ask for an order under s. 64 or s. 66 of the Solicitors Act, 1932. VAISEY, J., came to the conclusion that, by putting forward this item on the left hand side of the document, the solicitors had “delivered a charge” within the meaning of the order, and he, therefore, declined to accede to the executors’ application. For reasons which will
B presently appear, I do not myself desire or find it necessary to express an opinion on that matter, not the least because we have not heard argument on it from counsel for the solicitors.

Before us another point has arisen which was not considered by VAISEY, J., and which, in my judgment, is fatal to the contention of the solicitors that delivery of a bill cannot now be ordered by the court. It is this. The item
D which I have already read is, on the face of it, a composite item, £735, to cover not only legal charges, that is, profit costs and remuneration, but also disbursements. It is quite true that, as shown in the document dated Aug. 13, 1952, the disbursements included in the £735 represented but a small part of that sum, viz., £19 10s. 6d., but they might have been more; it would have been possible, if the argument of counsel for the solicitors is correct, to have
E lumped together the sum paid to the other firm of solicitors in respect of the surrender of the leases of Bentham Road, the remuneration in respect of which is, undoubtedly, included in the last item, and so to have given a lump figure, not of £735, but of £1,757 18s. 11d. The question, however, is not what might have been done, but whether what has been done is within the language of the order of 1934. It is, no doubt, a narrow point, but I have come to the conclusion
F that the order does not authorise the delivery of a charge including both profit costs and disbursements and without distinguishing between them, and then, having done that, to say that, if the client does not choose to ask for an itemised bill in six months, there is no obligation to deliver a bill of costs at all.

In the first place, as ROMER, L.J., observed during the argument, this order of 1934 is by way of exception to the general statutory obligation on all
G solicitors to render a bill in conformity with the provisions of the Act of 1932, a bill which would contain detailed charges in respect of all the several matters in respect of which the solicitor was entitled to charge remuneration. Its operation is further limited, according to the terms of the order itself, by reference to art. 2 (c) of the General Order, 1882. It is unnecessary for me to take up time by reading the whole of that order, but art. 2 (c) covers such H matters as are not comprised in art. 2 (a) and art. 2 (b), such, for example, as sales, purchases, and mortgages, leases and agreements for leases for all of which there are scales under sched. I to that order. Article 2 (c), in other words, may be treated as covering classes of non-contentious business for which the scales are inapplicable and for which the solicitor is entitled to charge in accordance with sched. II. Schedule II, speaking broadly (and with reference to the relevant time to which this matter relates), provides that the solicitor may charge for the various separate pieces of business that he does the several amounts indicated in the schedule. It is, I think, quite plain that the General Order of 1882 and the order of 1934 are directed to remuneration as distinct from disbursements, which are not, of course, remuneration at all, but are sums paid out by the solicitor as agent for the client which, on general principles, he is entitled to get back from the client. Until the order of 1934 was made, a solicitor, in default of express agreement, was bound to deliver to his client a bill which, although it related to matters within art. 2 (c), showed in detail the exact charges made for every piece of work the solicitor had done. The order of 1934 was made to enable a solicitor in cases where no scales were applicable to avoid having to show in detail each charge he made for his professional services, but entitled him, instead, to charge for his remuneration a lump sum.

It follows, I think, plainly from what I have said and from the purposes of the order and its history and background, that the order was only concerned with remuneration and there was nothing in it which justified a solicitor charging a lump sum to cover both remuneration and expenses, and, in the absence of some express authority so to do, he cannot, under the Act or under any other order, justify his having so done. It, therefore, seems to me necessarily to follow that the item which I have read "To Messrs. Percy Walker & Co., legal charges and disbursements . . . £735", is not a charge which falls within the terms of the order of 1934 and cannot be justified by reference to that order. If that is right, no bill—and counsel for the solicitors was disposed to agree—has, in fact, ever been delivered. Subject to the question of discretion, therefore, it is plain that the right of the executors under the Act of 1932 is now to call for an itemised bill. Having reached that conclusion it will appear that it is unnecessary to express an opinion on the general, and not unimportant, matter which was, in fact, decided in favour of the solicitors by VAISEY, J., namely, whether the inclusion of this item in this account was the delivery of a charge.

There remains, therefore, only this further point. The court has a discretion whether, in a given set of circumstances, it will order the delivery of a bill. Counsel for the solicitors relied on Re A Solicitor. Re Taxation of Costs (1), as indicating that where there has been a lapse of time such as passed here, it would not be right for the court to order delivery of a bill on the application of a client who, during the period which has elapsed, did not take the trouble to avail himself of his statutory right, and, until he received inspiration from another case, made no complaint whatever about the bill, which he had, in fact, paid. The matter, being one of discretion, must obviously be decided by the court according to the facts of the particular case before it. I say no more about Re A Solicitor (1) than that the length of time which had passed, the circumstances relating to the actual charge said to have been delivered, and the communications which passed during an interval of six years, were all of a nature which make that case wholly different in its general aspect from the present case. All that can be said against the clients here is that they did not challenge the bill in 1949, although the male executor raised a query about it, and that for three years they continued to treat the solicitors with confidence, and, indeed, instructed them in certain other matters, but beyond that, I do not think it could be possibly said that, by their conduct, they have deprived themselves of the right, which otherwise they would possess, to have a proper bill. At any rate, exercising my discretion to the best of my ability in this case, I think it would be right to make the order for the delivery of an itemised bill of costs for which the executors have asked. I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that on the narrow point with which I have tried to deal and which, as I have said, was not debated before VAISEY, J., or taken into consideration by him, this appeal should be allowed and an order made for delivery of an itemised bill in the ordinary way.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

Re SUTHERLAND SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), April 22, 23, 1953.]

Settled Land—Repairs—Expenditure by assign of tenant for life—Recoupment out of capital money—Improvements—Repairs to agricultural property executed before Mar. 1, 1948—Settled Land Act, 1925 (c. 18), s. 73 (1) (iv) (as amended by Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 96 (1)).

Expenditure on repairs done to agricultural land before Mar. 1, 1948, not being within the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, is not money expended by a landlord "under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, or any similar previous enactment, or under custom or agreement or otherwise", and may not be repaid out of capital under s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, as amended by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 96 (1). The words "or otherwise" in s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, must be construed as ejusdem generis with the preceding words and mean "otherwise by reason of some obligation". By reason of the provisions of s. 107 (1) of the Settled Land Act a tenant for life, in giving directions to the trustees for the application of capital money under s. 75 (2) of the Settled Land Act, is acting as a trustee and may not allow his interest to conflict with his duty.

Between 1945 and Mar. 1, 1948, expenditure amounting to over £4,000 was made out of income by an estate company, the assigns of the tenant for life, on repairs to agricultural property. In 1952 the tenant for life, purporting to act under s. 75 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, directed the trustees of the settlement to apply capital moneys in recouping this expenditure. The trustees declined to do so. On an application by the company for directions to the trustees, HELD: the trustees had rightly declined, the expenditure having been incurred before the amendment of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (iv), by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 96 (1).

ADJOURNED SUMMONS asking that the trustees of the settlement, the Royal Bank of Scotland, be directed to pay to the applicant, the Staffordshire and Shropshire Estates Co., Ltd., out of capital money, costs incurred between 1945 and Mar. 1, 1948, by the applicant on improvements authorised under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (iv).

E. I. Goulding for the trustees of the settlement.

E. G. Wright for the tenant in tail in remainder and the Law Reversionary Interest Society, Ltd., an incumbrancer on the interest of the life tenant.

HARMAN, J.: This is an application under s. 84, s. 93, and s. 113 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, by a company who are the assigns of the life estate of the Duke of Sutherland under a settlement dated Sept. 13, 1909. It seeks a direction to the Royal Bank of Scotland, who are trustees of the settlement, to recoup to the applicant money expended between 1945 and 1948 on what are said to be improvements of a nature authorised under the Settled Land Act. The applicant argues that the trustees were wrong in declining to pay that money, and, moreover, that they have no option but to make the repayment once they are satisfied, first, that the work done comes within the category of improvements, and, secondly, that it was the cause of the expenditure. The points at issue are twofold: first, whether in fact the trustees have no discretion in the matter, and, secondly, supposing they have none, whether these works, which were executed before an amendment to the Act of 1925 by s. 96 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, come within the Act of 1925 as amended.

The facts are as follows. The settlement was a real estate settlement originally made in 1909 under which the duke is, and has been for a number of years, the tenant for life. There is a jointure outstanding to his mother, and the only remainderman before me is the respondent, his niece, Mrs. Janson, who is tenant in tail in remainder if the duke have no issue. The respondent, the Law Reversionary Interest Society, Ltd., is incumbrancer on the life interest of the duke, he, or the company on his behalf, having sold to that society a slice of the settled income for the duke's life. Therefore, under s. 104 of the Settled Land Act, no application of capital money can be made except for certain purposes without its consent. That consent, as also that of the remainderman, is given, the latter being sui juris, and entitled to take the view that she does not wish to oppose the application. By my direction the case was argued by counsel for the trustees as representing a possible unborn infant who may displace the interest of Mrs. Janson, and, also (her tenancy in tail not having been barred) any issue of hers.

The Lilleshall and South Staffordshire estates comprised in the settlement have long since been sold and the settled property now consists of a comparatively large sum in gilt-edged securities and also an estate in Surrey called the Sutton Place estate, which is partly agricultural land and partly land let for other purposes. The duke, as life tenant under the settlement, by an instrument of Mar. 29, 1927, conveyed his life interest to the applicant, a family company controlled by himself. It appears from the evidence that, in the course of their management of the Sutton Place estate, the company in the years before 1948 spent moneys amounting to some £4,000 odd in repairs and improvements to the property which are set out in an exhibit before me. They were of such a character that nobody would then have considered them to be payable out of capital. It was, therefore, the ordinary act of a landowner repairing or maintaining the property of which he was the owner. It is to be observed that a very large amount of the repairs in question was done to properties which were let by the company to the duke himself and were, therefore, in effect, properties in hand. For instance, I find that in 1947 the largest single item in the whole application, £1,688, was spent on Ladygrove Farm—the occupation of which is in the duke's hands—for repairing roofs to farm buildings, building brick pillars to replace wooden supports, and so on. Many of the items are of a comparatively trivial nature, for example, one finds that repairing the water closet pan and joint to soil pipe in 1946 is said to be the type of improvement which may be paid for out of capital. The whole matter has given me a good deal of disquiet. If repairs of this sort can be done at the expense of capital, it is a complete revolution of all ideas that lawyers have had for many years about the relation between capital and income under the Settled Land Acts. It is well known that certain improvements might be done at the expense of capital, and under sched. III to the Act of 1925 there were three categories of such improvements. The first, from their permanent character, were allowed to be paid for out of capital; the second was an intermediate class which the trustees or the court might require the tenant for life to repay by instalments spread over a period of twenty-five years; and the third was a class the costs of which the trustees must, if spending capital, require to be so recouped. Even in the third class one does not find anything in the nature of what one may call running repairs.

The applicant contends that this revolution has been brought about by an alteration of the Settled Land Act, 1925, by a side-wind in the shape of s. 96 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. Since July, 1948, when that Act came into force, the trustees have allowed certain moneys year by year to the company as the duke's assign at his request. I am not concerned with those expenses. The trustees have been advised, no doubt, that they are acting within their powers, and I have no cause to question anything they have done, but the trustees declined to pay for the repairs executed before this Act came into force on the ground that they were executed at a time when there was no thought that they would be paid for out of capital and that there is no power under the Act as it stands to recoup repairs perfected before the Act of 1948 came into force and at a time when they were not legally payable out of capital.

This entails a certain amount of investigation of the two Acts. Section 73 (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, provides:

"Capital money arising under this Act . . . shall, when received, be . . . applied wholly in one . . . or others, of the following modes . . . (iii) In payment for any improvement authorised by this Act; (iv) In payment as for an improvement authorised by this Act of any money expended and costs incurred by a landlord under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, or any similar previous enactment, or under custom or agreement or otherwise, in or about the execution of any improvement comprised in Part I or Part II of sched. I to the said Agricultural Holdings Act."

One finds nothing in Part I or Part II of sched. I to that Act of 1923 which would justify payment under this sub-section of any of the repairs specified here. Section 75 (1) of the Settled Land Act reads:

"Capital money arising under this Act shall, in order to its being . . . applied as aforesaid, be paid either to the trustees . . . or into court . . . and shall be . . . applied by the trustees, or under the direction of the court . . . accordingly. (2) The investment or other application by the trustees shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life . . ."

The applicant relies on this last section to show that the trustees have no discretion where they have a direction from the tenant for life which is mandatory and binding on them. Under s. 83 "improvements" are described, and they are set out in sched. III to the Act. When one looks at that schedule, one finds nothing in the nature of repairs even though the matters specified must be recouped in any event out of income over an extended period. Under s. 84 (2) the old obligation on the tenant for life to introduce a scheme of improvements before setting out on his work is abolished, and, instead, the trustees are exonerated if they act on a certificate of a surveyor to the effect that the work comprised in the improvement has been properly executed and what amount is properly payable in respect thereof. They must have either that certificate or an order of the court directing or authorising them so to apply a specified portion. One of the features of this case is that there is certainly not at present a certificate on which the trustees could safely act under that sub-section. The works having been done so long ago, nobody can now certify much about them because of the lack of vouchers and the impossibility of seeing, eight years later, whether a tap has been re-washed or a water closet pipe renewed. It is, therefore, a matter for an order of the court. Section 107 (1) provides:

"A tenant for life . . . shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties."

It follows from that sub-section that, in giving a mandate to the trustees under s. 75, the tenant for life is acting as trustee and must, as trustee, have regard, not only to his own interests and those of his assign, but also to the interests of the remainderman.

That was the position of the law when these works were done, and, as I say, nobody anticipated that there would be any application to pay for them out of capital because it was quite obvious at that time that they could not be so defrayed. But, in 1948 the Agricultural Holdings Act was passed, which was partly a consolidating Act and partly enacted new law. One finds in s. 1 that agricultural land means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purposes of a trade or business. Section 81 (1) reads:

"Where under powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925 . . . capital money is applied in or about the execution of any improvement specified in sched. III to this Act no provision shall be made for requiring the money . . . to be replaced . . ."

In other words, all money applied under the Settled Land Act by reference to this Act is to be a Part I improvement—that is to say, the most permanent sort of improvement—and there is to be no obligation to repay by instalments. In s. 94 (1) one finds this odd definition of what is called "fixed equipment":

"'Fixed equipment' includes any building or structure affixed to land and any works on, in, over or under land, and also includes anything grown on land for a purpose other than use after severance from the land, consumption of the thing grown or of produce thereof, or amenity, and any reference to fixed equipment on land shall be construed accordingly."

In s. 96 (1) one finds this:

"References in any enactment . . . to sched. I to the said Act of 1923, shall be construed as follows, that is to say—(a) references to Part I, II or III thereof shall be construed respectively as references to sched. III to this Act, to Part II of that schedule and to sched. IV to this Act."

That is a method whereby s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, is amended and it is a very strange way of doing it. One must now read s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act as referring, not to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, but to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. The resulting paragraph reads: "In payment as for an improvement authorised by this Act of any money expended and costs incurred by a landlord under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, or any similar previous enactment . . . in or about the execution of any improvement comprised in sched. III to the Act of 1948". The title to sched. III reads:

"Improvements begun on or after Mar. 1, 1948, for which compensation is payable if consent of landlord or approval of the Minister is obtained to their execution."

"Landlord" here means the life tenant, and, consequently, if he is the one to be paid, of course, his consent is not required. The improvements are in two parts. Part I includes "Improvements to which consent of landlord required", and are comparatively permanent improvements to farming land, and Part II includes: "Improvements to which consent of landlord or approval of the Minister required", and that instances a number of comparatively large agricultural works of drainage and cultivation, but under para. 23 one finds an altogether different category in these words:

- A "Repairs to fixed equipment, being equipment reasonably required for the proper farming of the holding, other than repairs which the tenant is under an obligation to carry out."

B It is well known that in agricultural leases there were, at any rate until 1948, a number of matters in respect of which neither the landlord nor the tenant was under an obligation, but under the Act of 1948, as I understand it, the Minister has produced a code in the form of a statutory instrument putting all those liabilities on one side of the line or the other so that they are the liabilities of either the landlord or of the tenant. One must find, therefore, in order that para. 23 of Part II of sched. III shall apply, that the repairs are not repairs which the tenant is under an obligation to carry out. It is certified that none of the repairs in this case was a repair which the tenant was under an obligation to carry out. Nor were they, it appears, repairs which C the landlord was under an obligation to carry out. They were carried out for the duke and for other tenants by the company as a good landlord in the course of good estate management, and were, therefore, voluntarily done.

D It will be observed that these new types of improvement, so far as the Agricultural Holdings Act is concerned, must have been begun on or after Mar. 1, 1948, and that would exclude altogether the repairs with which I am concerned. It is said, however, that all that is imported into the Settled Land Act is the category of improvement in question, and that when one speaks of "any improvement comprised in Parts I and II of sched. III to the Act" it has only to be comprised in the sense that if you look down the items you find it. For that there is the authority of Re Lord Sherborne's Settled Estate (1). That was a case under the Act of 1925 and concerned with improvements done E before that Act came into force. The language there was quite different, but I will assume it covers the present case. First, therefore, were these costs incurred under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948? It was conceded in the course of the argument that one could not say that these costs were incurred under or in pursuance of an Act which was not in existence when the money was expended and that, therefore, the applicant could not rely F on that part of the section.

The following words of s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Act of 1925 are "or any similar previous enactment". The previous enactment similar was the Act of 1923, and it was not suggested that these repairs were within the provisions of that Act. Then follows "or under custom or agreement". It was not suggested G that it was either a custom or that there was an agreement that these repairs should be done, and the applicant was eventually driven to the words "or otherwise". He said that "or otherwise" meant "or not"—in other words, that the whole of the reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act or the previous enactment or custom or agreement were surplus and that all that was needed were the words "money expended and costs incurred by a landlord in or about the execution of any improvement comprised in the schedule". It seems to H me that "or otherwise", in the ordinary course of construction, must mean otherwise connected in some way with what has preceded it. The ejusdem generis rule must apply, and, in my judgment, if I was free so to construe it, I should construe it as "or in some other way analogous to custom, agreement, or a previous enactment". There may well be other ways. For instance, an Act of Parliament not being an Agricultural Holdings Act. I accept the view put forward by counsel for the trustees that "otherwise" means otherwise under some obligation, and these repairs were not done, I am told, under any obligation whatsoever. Consequently, if I were free to do so, I should hold that these repairs, being done before Mar. 1, 1948, did not come within s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Act of 1925 at all.

It is said, however, that I am precluded from so holding by a decision of VAISEY, J., in Re Duke of Northumberland (2). Assuming that I am wrong, the question will arise whether the trustees had any discretion, and it was said that this decision of VAISEY, J., obliges me to say that they had no discretion. I am not sure that that is so. That decision, to which I will refer later, does, indeed, say that they are bound to act on the direction of the tenant for life, but the learned judge held himself free to limit the time over which the application might extend, and that must have been, as I understand it, putting it on the footing that there was a discretion so to do. It is said by the applicant here that there is no limit to the time to which an application may go back. I suppose 1926 is a limit, but, at any rate, to that extent a demand for recoupment may go back so far as the tenant for life thinks desirable. The consequences are, of course, very serious. When works of this sort were done so many years ago it is impossible to tell whether the money was spent or not. It seems to me that, if there be a discretion, the trustees could rightly say that such repairs ought not to be paid for on the ground that they were not done by the tenant for life in the faith that they would be repaid, and that, having been done voluntarily and paid for by the tenant for life, it was a discretion which ought not to be exercised. In Re Borough Court Estate (3) MAUGHAM, J., held that, as the applicant must at the time have expected himself to pay the sums spent on improvements which after 1925 came within Part II of sched. III to the Settled Land Act, 1925, the jurisdiction ought not to be exercised. Therefore, if it is a discretionary jurisdiction, it seems to me that it is one that ought not to be exercised. It is said that it is not discretionary because the duke has, in exercise of his powers under s. 75, directed the trustees to apply the capital money in this way, but, as I have already pointed out, the duke, in giving that direction, was acting as a trustee for all parties, and, in my view, he cannot properly give a direction which puts money into his own pocket and the pockets of his own assign in respect of farmhouses and other property which he is himself occupying, and the repairs to which would be no good to the inheritance whatever, but merely to relieve his own pocket. It seems to me that as a trustee those are not directions which he can properly give. He can ask the trustees whether they will pay, and they must have a discretion whether they will or not, and, in my judgment, if that applied, they ought to decline, as they have done. I would come to the conclusion in this particular case, if the repairs be within the schedule and if the duke purports to direct them to be done, that he is allowing his duty as a trustee, he having a duty towards the remaindermen, to be overridden by his interest, which is to have them done at capital expense in order that he as tenant of the farm may be better off. I, therefore, think it is not a case in which he can give such a direction.

In Re Duke of Northumberland (2) the tenant for life had been spending on repairs since 1945 moneys in excess of the rents he received, and he applied to have the moneys recouped. Some, but not all, of the repairs, as I understand it, could only be charged as improvements under s. 96 (1) of and sched. III to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. Some of them had been done before Mar. 1, 1948, and some after, and the learned judge was asked whether those done before that date came within the Act, so that the point was, I think, taken. The learned judge held that it was possible to go back to January, 1945, but he did not deal with the question whether they were repairs done under or in pursuance of the Act. In that case the date of Jan. 1, 1945, was applicable, because (a) the evidence did not cover any earlier period, and (b) the recoupment of expenditure made more than six years previously appeared to be inconsistent with the principles laid down in Re Borough Court Estate (3),

The point taken here, therefore, does not appear in the headnote at all, but it was also held that the trustees must comply with the directions of the tenant for life on being satisfied that the application of capital money was or would be within the relevant provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and consistent with the judgment. Therefore, he did hold that improvements going back to 1945, and, apparently, although it does not appear clearly, justified only under the schedule to the Act of 1948, were, nevertheless, within the powers of the trustees to pay for, and which it was their duty to recoup if so directed by the tenant for life. During the argument counsel said that on Mar. 1, 1948, a new list of improvements came into force, and the old list was not preserved for any transitional purposes. It could not, he said, have been intended that capital money should not be applied in repayment of past expenditure. The date had relevance, not to the expenditure of the money by the tenant for life, but to the recoupment of the money by the trustees. That point, apparently, was not met by counsel in answer. The learned judge reserved his judgment, in which he read part of s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act in this way ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1184):

“Turning to the relevant statutory provisions, I observe, first, that capital money is applicable under s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act, 1925: ‘in payment as for an improvement authorised by this Act of any money expended and costs incurred by a landlord under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 . . .’”

He does not read the “custom or otherwise” part of the section at all. He then mentions that for “1923” he must read “1948” and assumes in his judgment that the repairs before him were repairs done under or in pursuance of the Act of 1948. With due deference, I think that was, perhaps, a slip on his part, because, as I understand from counsel for the trustees, who argued the case before VAISEY, J., he had suggested, he could succeed, not on that footing, but only under the words “or otherwise”, and the learned judge in his judgment nowhere deals with the point of those words, but assumes that all the repairs were done under or in pursuance of the Act of 1948. The learned judge had a number of other difficult questions to decide, and it is not surprising that, taking them all together as he did, and after criticisms which I heartily indorse of this kind of method of legislating by reference, he says this (ibid., 1185):

“ . . . applying as best I can the law as it seems to me to emerge from this welter of confused and confusing enactment, I will answer the question raised by the summons as follows. Under paras. (i), (ii) and (iii) of the summons [i.e., both in respect of the period before and the period after Mar. 1, 1948, which he takes together] I will declare that under the enactments mentioned in para. (i) [that included the Act of 1948] the plaintiffs, as trustees . . . are entitled to apply capital moneys of the said settlement in payment (as for an improvement authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925) of any money expended or to be expended and costs incurred or to be incurred by the tenant for life under the said settlement in or about the execution on or after Jan. 1, 1945, on such repairs as are specified in para. 23 of sched. III to the Act of 1948 in relation to agricultural land . . .”

It is quite true that that is an authority for recoupment of expenditure before 1948, but it seems to me that the learned judge overlooked that particular detail. It is only one of a number of other matters which he had to decide, and I do not think I am bound to follow it: quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus. As to the other point on s. 75 of the Settled Land Act with which he dealt, he did not have s. 73 called to his notice, nor were the circumstances identical, for the cottages repaired were not occupied by the tenant for life though some were in the hands of estate employees. Where improvements are executed in the period after 1948, the tenant for life may properly give the direction because the statute contemplates that he shall do so and because the expenditure is, no doubt, incurred initially in reliance on its being repaid, but in a case where the expenditure has already been made with no such reliance, it does not seem to me that the tenant for life is entitled to say: "Now that the law has been changed, I do not see why I should not have the money out of capital". In my judgment, this application ought to be refused and the trustees ought not to apply the capital money as requested in paying for these particular improvements.

Order accordingly.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. HAYS WHARF CARTAGE CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Gorman, J.), April 14, 15, 16, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Licence—Rate of duty—Haulage vehicle—Unladen weight—Ballast block—"Loose equipment"—Tractor carrying tools and ballast—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 26—Finance Act, 1933 (c. 19), s. 25, sched. VII, Part II, para. 4 (e) (ii).

The owners of a heavy duty tractor fitted to it a cast iron block, some fifty hundredweights in weight, which was held in position by angle-irons, and was used as ballast. Other pieces of metal, heavy chain, and similar articles were also carried on the vehicle.

HELD: (i) the carriage of tools or ballast, or any other object to assist its propulsion or render it fit for the purposes of haulage, did not detract from the essential character of the tractor as a haulage vehicle, and the tractor, being used for "haulage solely", fell within the Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part II, para. 4 (e), and the rate of excise duty was at the rate laid down in para. 4 (e) (ii).

(ii) the iron block, when fixed to the vehicle was not "loose equipment" within the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, but formed part of the vehicle, and, therefore, must be included in its weight unladen, thereby increasing the rate of excise duty payable on it from that paid by the defendants.

Darling v. Burton (1928 S.C. (J.) 11) and Lowe v. Stone ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1076), considered.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, consolidated certain enactments relating to excise duties on mechanically propelled vehicles, including, inter alia, the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14, the Finance Act, 1933, s. 25 and sched. VII, the Finance Act, 1935, s. 3, and the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 4 and sched. II.

ACTION for the balance of excise duty alleged to be owing by the defendants in respect of a motor vehicle, and a declaration that the vehicle was either a haulage vehicle under the Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part II, para. 4 (e) (ii), or a goods vehicle under Part III, para. 5 (c) and (d), of the same schedule, as amended.

A The defendants, Hays Wharf Cartage Co., Ltd., were the owners of a Scammell heavy duty tractor. On the platform behind the driver's cabin, and over the rear axle, was fitted a strong wooden box frame covered with tarpaulin. On July 18, 1946, the plaintiffs, the London County Council, inspected the vehicle on the ground that the defendants had failed to pay the proper rate of excise duty on it. On that day, there was fixed to the vehicle, in the box behind the cab, a cast iron block, some fifty hundredweights in weight, fastened by angle-irons. There were also on the vehicle some pieces of heavy plate steel, some short lengths of heavy chain, "D" shackles, and ship jacks. The plaintiffs contended that the block was attached to the vehicle as fixed ballast, and that the other articles were also used as ballast. They also contended that the vehicle was either a "haulage" vehicle under the Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part II, para. 4 (e) (ii), or that it was a "goods" vehicle under the Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part III, para. 5 (c) and (d), as amended by the Finance Act, 1935, s. 3 (2), and the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 4 (3), and sched. II, Part II. They claimed that, into whichever category the vehicle fell, the defendants had not paid the appropriate rate of excise duty. The defendants, in their defence, admitted that the vehicle was a haulage vehicle, but denied that they had ever used fixed ballast, though they had used ballast on occasions, and they contended that the ballast ought not to be taken into account in determining the weight unladen of the vehicle under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and R. J. S. Harvey for the plaintiffs.

Karmel, Q.C., and S. B. R. Cooke for the defendants.

E GORMAN, J., stated the facts and considered the evidence, and found as a fact that on July 18, 1946, there was in use on the vehicle a fixed ballast block, weighing some fifty hundredweights, and that other articles were primarily on the vehicle for use as loose tools or equipment and not as ballast, and continued: The first matter that I am concerned with is whether this vehicle was a haulage vehicle or not. The Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part II, para. 4 (e), contains this definition of haulage vehicles:

F "Vehicles . . . which are constructed and used upon roads for haulage solely . . ."

In Part III, para. 5, of the same schedule there is a definition of "goods vehicles". Counsel for the plaintiffs asks me to say that the two definitions are not necessarily exclusive, but at any rate, so far as a haulage vehicle is concerned, the governing words of that definition are "constructed and used upon roads for haulage solely". Paragraph 4 (e) continues:

G ". . . and not for the purpose of carrying or having superimposed upon them any load except such as is necessary for their propulsion or equipment."

H Endeavouring properly to interpret that, the governing words are "haulage solely", but it is conceded that even though a vehicle is "constructed and used for haulage solely" it may be necessary to "carry or superimpose" something on it. But that which is carried or superimposed on it must not take away the essential nature and function of that vehicle, i.e., construction and use for "haulage solely". It seems to me that it is not straining the words of that definition to put it in this way: ". . . and not for the purpose of carrying or having superimposed upon them any load except such as is necessary for their propulsion or their equipment". There is a difference between what one might call a common noun and an abstract noun. "Equipment" might refer to particular items, and, on the other hand, it might refer to a state of being equipped. It seems to me that what is postulated in that definition is that the vehicle must be used for "haulage solely", but that if anything is put on it which is necessary either for its propulsion or properly to render it fit for purposes of haulage that shall not prevent its being a haulage vehicle. You might, for instance, have tools, or such things as blocks or ballast being added, in order to render it in a fit state of equipment for its work as a haulage vehicle. I have also considered the definition of "goods vehicle" in the Finance Act, 1933, sched. VII, Part III, para. 5. There are two expressions which add greatly to the width of it. One is, "for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description", and the other is "whether in the course of trade or otherwise". Having heard counsel for both sides, my view is that this vehicle comes within the definition of a haulage vehicle, i.e., within the description of vehicles in para. 4 (e) of Part II of sched. VII to the Act of 1933. There might be, as counsel for the plaintiffs says, some overlapping of these two definitions, but, in my judgment, this is in fact a haulage vehicle.

The next matter I have to consider is the application to this vehicle of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26. It is submitted by counsel for the defendants that the ballast (using the word in its widest possible form) must be excluded from the weight unladen of a vehicle. He divided the section up into the positive and the negative parts, the positive part going down to the word "but" and the negative part following thereafter, and he contended that the section is inapt to include anything by way of ballast. He said that, to start with, ballast is not "parts" but it is "equipment". On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiffs says that the section is apt, having regard to the whole of its terms, to include ballast. I have been referred, so far as this section is concerned, to two authorities. The first was Darling v. Burton (1), which was an action brought under the Roads Act, 1920, s. 7 (6), which provided, in the same words as now appear in s. 26 of the Act of 1930, that:

" . . . the weight unladen of any vehicle shall be taken to be the weight of the vehicle inclusive of the body and all parts . . . which are necessary to or ordinarily used with the vehicle when working on a road, but exclusive of the weight of . . . loose equipment . . ."

It was held (1928 S.C. (J.) 11):

"that movable shelving, fitted to slide on brackets in a baker's van, and used to facilitate the delivery of goods to customers, was loose equipment within the meaning of the section, and did not fall to be included in the weight unladen of the vehicle."

In his judgment, the Lord Justice-General (LORD CLYDE) said (ibid., 13) that the respondent

"had brackets affixed to the inside of the body—which thus became undoubtedly parts of the body, and consequently added to 'the weight unladen' of the vehicle. By means of these brackets he was able to slide or run into the inside of the body trays, shelves, or boards containing his products, and made of a size to fit the inside of the body."

Then the question was whether they had to be included in the weight of the vehicle (ibid., 14):

"It will be observed that they play no part except as a facility for loading the van, and perform no function except as holders, or containers of the goods transported. Boxes, baskets, trays of one kind or another, and cans are familiarly used in tradesmen's delivery vans; but it would hardly occur to anyone to regard them as parts of the unladen vehicle . . . What then are they, in the phraseology of the section? I see no difficulty in regarding them as included under the statutory term 'loose equipment', and loose equipment is not to be included in the unladen weight."

LORD BLACKBURN said that he agreed. I think it is important in considering that case to bear in mind what LORD CLYDE said (ibid., 14):

A " . . . that they play no part except as a facility for loading the van, and perform no function except as holders, or containers of the goods transported."

In Lowe v. Stone (2) the headnote is ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1076):

B "To enable a motor lorry to carry coal slack without scattering it on the road, boards were fitted to the sides of the vehicle by means of slots. The unladen weight of the vehicle was just under three tons without the boards and just over three tons with the boards, and the boards were not fitted when the vehicle was used for other purposes. The vehicle was licensed as a three ton vehicle and the appellants were charged, under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14 (2), with unlawfully using it in an altered condition which brought it within a class of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was applicable under s. 14 (1). The appellants contended that, under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, the boards should not be included in calculating the weight of the vehicle as they were 'loose equipment' within the meaning of that section. Held: since the result of fixing the boards to the vehicle was that the vehicle was capable of carrying much larger loads, the boards could not be regarded merely as 'loose equipment' within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, so as not to be included in the weight of the vehicle . . ."

Darling v. Burton (1) was cited, and LORD GODDARD, C.J., said (ibid., 1078):

E "In support of his argument that the boards should be regarded as loose equipment, counsel for the appellants relied on Darling v. Burton (1), a Scottish case, in which the question was whether the trays with which bakers' vans are fitted should be regarded as loose equipment or as part of the van. The court held that those trays, which are merely put in the van to contain the bread, should be regarded as loose equipment. I respectfully agree that the judgment of the Lord Justice-General, LORD CLYDE, sitting in Justiciary, was right."

F Then (and this is, in my view, the important part) LORD GODDARD, C.J., said (ibid.):

G "The trays were no part of the van. They were shelves which were put into the van merely for holding the bread which was to be carried in the van. Their presence or absence made no difference to the van as a van, and they must necessarily be regarded as loose equipment. In fact, the presence of the shelves would tend to decrease, and not to increase, the load that was carried in the van, because, if the shelves were not in the van the bread could be packed much tighter than when it was placed in the ordinary manner on the shelves. In the present case the boards are affixed by means of slots to the sides of the van, with the result that the van is capable of carrying a much larger load . . . I think that if we held that the justices were wrong in this case and that the boards must be regarded merely as loose equipment, we would be opening a very wide door to evasions . . ."

H It seems to me that, if one considers this section on the findings which I have arrived at, one has to consider whether this ballast block, fixed and fastened as it was on July 18, 1946, was a part of the vehicle. I am satisfied that, in the condition in which it was on that day, July 18, 1946, it was a part of the vehicle, and was necessary to or ordinarily used with the vehicle when working on the road.

That does not exhaust the matter, because there then follows what counsel for the defendants has called the negative part of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26:

“ . . . but exclusive of the weight of water, fuel or accumulators . . . and of loose tools and loose equipment.”

Counsel for the defendants suggests that this block was in fact “equipment”. A
In my view, it was not equipment. It was not “loose equipment”. It was a part of the vehicle, and it was proper for that ballast block to be included in the weight unladen of the vehicle at that time.

*Statutory Instrument—Printing—Certificate of exemption—“Certificate”—Letter from Ministry of Supply stating that price schedules “have been certified to be exempted from printing”—Effect of failure to print instrument—Defence of absence of publication—Statutory Instruments Act, 1946 (c. 36), D
s. 2 (1), s. 3 (2)—Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947 (S.I., 1948, No. 1), reg. 7.*

The appellants were charged with selling iron and steel in excess of prices permitted by the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, as amended, these prices being set out in deposited schedules. A copy of the order was sent by an assistant secretary in the Ministry of Supply to the editor of statutory instruments at the Stationery Office together with a letter E stating, inter alia, that “the deposited schedules have been certified under reg. 7 [of the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947,] to be exempted from printing and sale as part of the copies of the instrument”. It was conceded by the Crown that if there were no certificate of exemption from printing, the onus lay on the Crown to show that reasonable steps had been taken to bring “the purport of the instrument to the notice of the public, or of persons likely to be affected by it, or of the person charged”, F within the meaning of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, s. 3 (2).

HELD: the letter to the editor of statutory instruments did not constitute a certificate within the meaning of reg 7. of the regulations of 1947; therefore, the Crown was not exempted from printing the deposited schedules as required by s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946; and, as the Crown had not proved that reasonable steps had been taken to bring the purport of the deposited schedules to the notice of the persons mentioned in s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1946, the appellants were entitled to rely on the provisions of that subsection and to be acquitted. G

Quaere, per PARKER, J., (i) whether the effect of a contravention of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946 in not causing to be printed a statutory instrument which was required to be printed was that the instrument was wholly invalid, and (ii) whether the defence under the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946,
s. 3 (2), was available even if a certificate under the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, reg. 7, had been issued. H

Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 361) which was in turn revoked and replaced by the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1953 (S.I., 1953, No. 169).

CASES STATED by Middlesex justices.

A On Oct. 16, 1952, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Tottenham, informations were preferred by the respondent, Leonard Newell, a higher executive officer of the Ministry of Supply, against each of the appellants, the Defiant Cycle Co., Ltd., and one MacNay and one Simmonds, directors of the company, that they on divers dates between May 18, 1951, and Aug. 30, 1951, sold steel of a class mentioned in the schedule to the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 252), as amended by the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1423) and the Iron and Steel Prices (No. 3) Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1549), at a price which was in excess of the scheduled maximum price, contrary to art. 1 (A) of the said order, as amended, and to reg. 55AB of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939.

C It was proved or admitted that the appellant company carried on business as dealers and merchants in steel; that the company made the sales referred to in the informations; that, on the publication of the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, and the said amending orders, the Minister of Supply caused to be distributed to each of the regional offices of the Ministry in the United Kingdom one copy of the schedules referred to in the orders; that the original signed deposited schedules were retained by him and were available for inspection by the public at Steel House, London; that none of the deposited schedules was D printed by the Queen's printer; that one Mrs. Silverston, an assistant secretary in the Ministry of Supply, whose duties included the making of arrangements for the printing of statutory instruments made by the Minister, decided, having regard to the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, reg. 7, that the printing and sale of the schedules referred to in each of the orders was unnecessary; that, in so deciding, she had regard primarily to the bulk E of the schedules, secondly, to the fact that copies thereof were to be made available through the regional offices, and, thirdly, to the fact (of which she was aware) that trade associations would be distributing to the trade copies of the schedules, or, at least, of such parts thereof as related to types of iron and steel most in demand; that Mrs. Silverston, when sending a copy of each of the said statutory instruments, also sent a letter to the editor of statutory F instruments, but that, save as aforesaid, the Minister of Supply did not give a certificate in writing in respect of the order or the amending orders; that many thousands of persons were involved in the iron and steel trade and were affected by these orders; and that, having regard to the bulk of the deposited schedules, it was impracticable for all to acquire the information therein contained.

G It was submitted on behalf of the appellants (i) that the orders were of no force, effect, or validity, on the ground that, as the deposited schedules which formed part of the orders had not been printed, and the Minister had failed to issue his certificate pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, reg. 7, exempting the schedules from the requirement of being printed, the orders had not been issued or published within the Statutory Instruments Act, H 1946; (ii) that the Minister of Supply had not proved that at the date of the purported issue of the orders he had taken reasonable steps to bring them to the notice of the public, or of persons likely to be affected thereby, or of the persons charged; and (iii) that on the evidence admitted or proved no offence was shown to have been committed. It was contended on behalf of the respondent (i) that by virtue of the Price Control and Other Orders (Indemnity) Act, 1951, any invalidity affecting the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, was removed; (ii) that, in any event, the orders were valid even if (which was not admitted) there had been any irregularity regarding the printing thereof; (iii) that each of the orders had been duly issued by Her Majesty's Stationery Office at the dates of the appellants' contraventions thereof; and (iv) that the letters sent by Mrs. Silverston to the editor of statutory instruments were or included certificates for the purpose of the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, reg. 7.

The justices were of the opinion (i) that the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, and the amendments thereof were validly made and of full force and effect in respect of the whole of the period covered by the said informations; (ii) that, if the orders were not valid apart from any irregularity in printing, then (a) by virtue of the Price Control and Other Orders (Indemnity) Act, 1951, the defects, if any, in regard to the orders had been validated, and (b) the letters referred to above were a sufficient compliance with the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, reg. 7, and (iii) that, accordingly, the fact that the deposited schedules were not printed did not invalidate any of these statutory instruments.

Viscount Hailsham, Q.C., and J. C. G. Burge for the appellants.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and J. P. Ashworth for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The point we have to decide arises under the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946. The scheme of the Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951, is to set out in a schedule prices which are said to be "basis prices per ton for the representative-basis-pricing specification". What that means I do not know, but it does not matter. In the body of the order reference is made to the deposited schedules, and, apparently, the price at which any sort of iron or steel can be sold is to be found in the deposited schedules.

By art. 6 (1):

" 'Deposited schedule' means any one of the ninety-seven deposited price schedules for any class of iron or steel mentioned in the schedule to this order lodged with the Minister of Supply and certified to be a deposited schedule accepted for the purpose of this order by the indorsement 'Iron and Steel Prices Order, 1951'."

Then there comes the rest of the indorsement which is to be "signed (with the date of signing) by an under-secretary or a principal assistant secretary in the Ministry of Supply". The printing of the ninety-seven deposited price schedules would, no doubt, be a very great burden, and would make one of these orders very bulky, and the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, has dealt with the probability that some orders will contain schedules of such a bulk or length that it would be undesirable to print them.

It is provided by s. 8 (1) of that Act:

"The Treasury may, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker of the House of Commons, by statutory instrument make regulations for the purposes of this Act, and such regulations may, in particular:—(a) provide for the different treatment of instruments which are of the nature of a public Act, and of those which are of the nature of a local and personal or private Act . . . (c) provide with respect to any classes or descriptions of statutory instrument that they shall be exempt, either altogether or to such extent as may be determined by or under the regulations, from the requirement of being printed and of being sold by the [Queen's] printer of Acts of Parliament, or from either of those requirements."

It is also provided in s. 3 (2):

"In any proceedings against any person for an offence consisting of a contravention of any such statutory instrument, it shall be a defence to prove that the instrument had not been issued by [Her] Majesty's Stationery Office at the date of the alleged contravention unless it is proved that at that date reasonable steps had been taken for the purpose of bringing the purport of the instrument to the notice of the public, or of persons likely to be affected by it, or of the person charged."

The regulations which were issued by the Treasury under the Act, namely, the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, provide by reg. 7:

A "If the responsible authority considers that the printing and sale in accordance with the requirements of s. 2 (1) of the [Statutory Instruments Act, 1946] of any schedule or other document which is identified by or referred to in a statutory instrument and would, but for the provisions of this regulation, be required to be included in the instrument as so printed and sold, is unnecessary or undesirable having regard to the nature or
B bulk of the document and to any other steps taken or to be taken for bringing its substance to the notice of the public, he may, on sending it to the [Queen's] printer of Acts of Parliament, certify accordingly; and any instrument so certified shall, unless the reference committee otherwise direct under these regulations, be exempt from the requirements aforesaid so far as concerns the document specified in the certificate."

C In this case, it is said, among other contentions that have been put forward, that no certificate was given by the responsible authority that the printing of the deposited schedules to this order was unnecessary. The first question which we have to consider, therefore, is: Was a certificate given by the responsible authority dispensing with the printing of these schedules?

D The only document that was proved at the trial and relied on as a certificate was a letter in these terms—I suppose it is a common form letter used in the Ministry of Supply to be filled in as the case may require:

"I am directed by the Minister of Supply to inform you that he has made a statutory instrument, of which one copy is annexed hereto, entitled——— and to request you to number it in accordance with reg. 3 of
E the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, and to be good enough to insert the number: (i) in all the copies of the instrument contained in this folder, and (ii) at (a) of para. 3 of the letter to the Stationery Office below. This instrument has been certified to be a general instrument under reg. 4 of the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, and I am to request you to treat it accordingly. The documents identified in this instrument
F as deposited schedules have been certified under reg. 7 to be exempted from printing and sale as part of the copies of the instrument; but subject thereto, copies of this instrument are to be printed and sold by the [Queen's] printer of Acts of Parliament. I am to request you to be good enough to complete and sign part 1 of the receipt sheet contained in this folder."

That letter is addressed to the editor of statutory instruments at the Stationery
G Office. It can hardly be contended, and it has only been faintly argued by the Solicitor-General, that that letter is a certificate. It is a letter which says there is a certificate, but the certificate was never produced. The letter clearly is not a certificate. Therefore, we have no difficulty in holding that no certificate under reg. 7 was ever issued.

H What is the effect of that? That is a point which it seemed to the court might deserve a very careful argument and very full consideration, but the Solicitor-General has accepted the position that the result is that, if no certificate has been given exempting the Queen's printer from printing the whole of the order, while it does not affect the validity of the order itself, it throws on the Crown the burden of proving that at the date of the commission of the offence reasonable steps had been taken for the purpose of bringing the purport of the instrument to the notice of the public, or of persons likely to be affected by it, or the person charged. It is abundantly clear from the Cases Stated that there was no evidence before the justices that the steps required by s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1946 to be proved by the prosecution had been taken, and that, therefore, the appellants were entitled to rely on that as a defence. No evidence was given on that point because, at the hearing, the Crown were relying on the letter (to which I have referred) as a certificate and as exempting them from the necessity of proving these facts. What was before the justices was evidence that an assistant secretary in the Ministry of Supply “whose duties included the making of arrangements for the printing of statutory instruments made by the Minister, decided, having regard to the provisions of reg. 7 of the Statutory Instruments Regulations, 1947, that the printing and sale of the said deposited schedules referred to in each of the said statutory instruments . . . was unnecessary; that in so deciding she had regard primarily to the bulk of the schedules: secondly to the fact that copies thereof were to be made available through the regional offices; and, thirdly, to the fact (of which she was aware) that trade associations would be distributing to the trade copies of the said deposited schedules or at least of such parts thereof as related to types of iron and steel most in demand.”

No doubt, she thought that those things were to be done, and her anticipation may have been correct. It may be she knew enough to be satisfied that in due course these things would be done, but that does not discharge the burden which the statute places on the Crown in the event, as the Solicitor-General has admitted, that there is no certificate exempting the Queen's printer from printing part of the order. The appellants contended that the Minister of Supply had not proved that at the date when he purported to issue the said statutory instruments he had taken reasonable steps to bring the purport of the said statutory instruments to the notice of the public, and, on the other hand, the Crown never contended that they had given any such evidence. The appellants were entitled to rely on the fact that this evidence had not been given, and, accordingly, the justices ought to have dismissed the informations.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree that this letter does not amount to a certificate, and no certificate, therefore, has been proved to have been given by the responsible authority, the Minister. The result is that, on the Solicitor-General's admission, s. 3 (2) applies and gives a defence to the appellants. They have proved that the order was not printed as, under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946, it ought to have been in full by the Stationery Office at the time of these alleged offences. No attempt was made, because of the contentions put forward by the Crown, to prove that “reasonable steps had been taken for the purpose of bringing the purport of the instrument to the notice of the public, or of persons likely to be affected by it, or of the person charged.”

There is no finding by the justices that that had been done, and it would be rather remarkable in view of the contentions put before them if they had ever addressed their minds to that question, having regard to the fact that they accepted the argument of the Crown on the first contention—that s. 3 (2) could not apply because of the certificate of exemption from printing which had been given. The result is that there was no certificate, there should have been printing, no printing had been done at the time of the commission of these offences, and there was no evidence on which the justices could be asked to find that the Crown had discharged the burden imposed under s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1946. The result is that these appeals must be allowed.

PARKER, J.: I agree, and would only add this. When counsel for the appellants opened this case, he submitted that the effect of a contravention of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, s. 2 (1), in not causing to be printed a statutory instrument which was required to be printed, was that the instrument was wholly invalid. He also contended that the effect of s. 3 (2) of that Act was that in every case, whether a statutory instrument was required to be printed or not, it was a defence to the subject if it had not been proved that reasonable steps had been taken for bringing the purport of the instrument to the notice of the public. Those matters clearly raise very important questions of principle, but, as the case has developed, it has become unnecessary to determine either of them. Once it appears that there has been no valid certificate exempting the deposited schedules from being printed, it is conceded that s. 3 (2) comes into operation. It is clear that no evidence was given—and, accordingly, there was no finding by the justices—that at the date of the alleged contraventions the reasonable steps required had been carried out. For these reasons I agree that these convictions should be quashed.

Appeal allowed.

CUMMINGS v. RICHARD THOMAS AND BALDWIN'S, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Hodson and Morris, L.J.J.), April 23, 24, 1953.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Transmission machinery—Duty to fence—Machinery dismantled, guard removed and power cut off—“In motion”

Movement by hand—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 13 (1), s. 14 (1), s. 16.

The Factories Act, 1937, s. 13 (1), provides that “Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced”. Section 16 provides that “All fencing or other safeguards . . . shall be of substantial construction, and constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced or safeguarded are in motion or in use . . .” The plaintiff, a fitter employed by the defendants, was instructed to carry out work of adjustment on a power-driven grinding machine in the defendants’ factory. Part of the machine, which consisted of a face plate rotated by belts and pulleys by which the motion of a prime mover was transmitted, was, when in normal use, “transmission machinery” within s. 152 (1) of the Act of 1937. At the material time the machine was dismantled, the motive power from the prime mover was cut off, and the guard which was normally provided in accordance with s. 16 had been removed. In order to do his work, the plaintiff pulled one of the belts by hand and so caused the face plate to revolve, and in so doing he injured his hand. In an action for breach of statutory duty and negligence,

HELD: transmission machinery did not cease to be such by reason only of the fact that no power was being transmitted to it by a prime mover, and (MORRIS, L.J., dissentiente) the transmission machinery was “in motion” within the meaning of s. 16 even though it was put into motion by the hand of an operator and not under the power derived from the prime mover; and, therefore, the defendants were in breach of their duty under s. 13 (1) and s. 16 in failing to provide a guard.

Per SINGLETON, L.J.: If the machinery on which the accident happened was not “transmission machinery” within s. 13 (1) and s. 152 (1), then it was a “dangerous part of . . . machinery” within s. 14 (1), and the requirements of s. 16 were equally applicable.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of PEARSON, J., at Swansea Assizes dated Nov. 26, 1952.

The plaintiff, William Cummings, was an experienced fitter employed by the defendants, Richard Thomas and Baldwins, Ltd. On Feb. 12, 1951, the plaintiff was engaged in work of adjustment on a power-driven Waldrick grinding machine, part of which consisted of a face plate rotated by belts and pulleys by which the motion of a prime mover was normally transmitted to the machine. At the material time the machine was not in use; it had been dismantled so that work of repair and adjustment could be done on it, and the power from the prime mover had been cut off. The guard, which was attached when the machine was used for its normal purpose, had been removed. The plaintiff had been instructed to drill two holes by means of a pneumatic drill in the face plate, one on either side, so that after drilling the first hole it was necessary to turn the face plate 180 degrees in order to drill the second hole directly opposite the first. The plaintiff, in order to turn the face plate, had to pull on the belt and so cause the shaft of the main machine to revolve. He was assisted by another fitter whose duty it was to tell the plaintiff when the face plate was in the correct position. After the first hole had been drilled, the plaintiff pulled on the belt and in so doing caught the little finger of his left hand between the belt and the pulley, thus suffering injury. He brought an action against his employers alleging breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, and negligence at common law. PEARSON, J., held that the defendants were in breach of statutory duty and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and R. Geraint Rees for the plaintiff.

Nelson, Q.C., and G. P. Thomas for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff's case in this court and before the learned judge is based on the safety provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 12 to s. 16. Section 12 (1) provides for the fencing of flywheels directly connected with any prime mover and every moving part of any prime mover. Section 13 deals with transmission machinery. Section 13 (1) provides:

"Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced."

It is said that the machine in which the plaintiff's hand was caught was transmission machinery. It was submitted by counsel on behalf of the defendants that, although it might properly have been regarded as transmission machinery at other times, it was not transmission machinery within the meaning of this section at the time the accident took place. Section 14 deals with machinery other than transmission machinery. Section 14 (1) provides:

“Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced.”

- A Thus, by s. 12 prime movers must be securely fenced, and by s. 13 transmission machinery must be securely fenced, the reason being that it is assumed for the purposes of s. 12 and s. 13 that flywheels on prime movers are dangerous parts of machinery and that transmission machinery is a dangerous part of machinery. By s. 14, every dangerous part of machinery in a factory is to be securely fenced.
- B It is a question of fact in the case of s. 14 whether or not the machinery with which the court is concerned is dangerous machinery. The submission on behalf of the plaintiff is that, if the machinery on which this accident happened was not transmission machinery, then it was dangerous machinery within the meaning of s. 14. Section 16 provides:

- C “All fencing or other safeguards provided in pursuance of the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall be of substantial construction, and constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced or safeguarded are in motion or in use . . .”

The object of s. 16 is to ensure that the guard or safety device is of substantial construction and is constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced are in motion or in use.

- D It was submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that when the plaintiff pulled the belt he caused motion within the machinery, or he moved a part of the machinery, and that consequently it was either (a) transmission machinery in motion, or (b) dangerous machinery in motion. The submission made by counsel for the defendants was that this was not transmission machinery or dangerous machinery, and that in any event it could not be said that it was machinery of either class in motion at the time of this accident.

Transmission machinery is defined in s. 152 (1) of the Act:

- F “‘Transmission machinery’ means every shaft, wheel, drum, pulley, system of fast and loose pulleys, coupling clutch, driving-belt or other device by which the motion of a prime mover is transmitted to or received by any machine or appliance.”

It is not disputed that this machine was transmission machinery within that definition at the time that it was coupled up and working by means of mechanical energy. Prime mover is defined in the same section:

- G “‘Prime mover’ means every engine, motor or other appliance which provides mechanical energy derived from steam, water, wind, electricity, the combustion of fuel or other source.”

“Machinery” is defined by the same section to include any “driving-belt”. I have reached the conclusion that this was transmission machinery although power had been cut off from it some time before the accident happened. I do not think that it thereby ceased to be transmission machinery.

- H The argument of counsel for the defendants was that there must be some limit imposed on the defining words, otherwise one must regard machinery of this kind as transmission machinery if it was on its way to the works or if it had reached the factory yard and had been placed there, or, again, if it were dismantled wholly or in part, one part could still be regarded as a part of transmission machinery. It seems to me that that is a question of fact for the judge to consider on the precise words of s. 13 whether or not a machine on which an accident happens is a part of the transmission machinery at the time the accident happened, not a moment before or after. If the machinery is in the factory ready for use by mechanical energy, I consider, as the learned judge thought, that it remains transmission machinery. If it were dismantled to some extent, the court would decide whether in the circumstances some part of it which was still there was a part, not of transmission machinery, but a part of the transmission machinery, taking the precise words of s. 13 of the Act. In my view, this was a part of the transmission machinery.

It is said that the machinery was not in motion, and s. 16 provides that the safeguard or fencing shall be constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced or safeguarded are in motion or in use. It was not contended that the transmission machinery was "in use" at the time, but it was submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that it was "in motion" when it was put into motion by the plaintiff pulling the belt. To that counsel for the defendants replied: "You must look at the definition of 'transmission machinery' and of 'prime mover', and you find then that the whole outlook is based on movement by mechanical energy". That is an interesting argument, but I find myself unable to read that meaning into s. 16. Transmission machinery is presumed to be dangerous machinery. It has to be fenced or guarded, and the fence has to be maintained when that machinery is in motion or in use. There may be equal danger, or at least a considerable degree of danger, if part of that transmission machinery is moved by hand. Once it is established that it is transmission machinery I do not regard it as necessary to show that the movement or motion of that machinery, or of some part of it, is by means of mechanical energy. The words in s. 16 are: not "in motion by mechanical energy or in use." It seems to me that the submission which counsel makes on this point is equivalent to asking the court to read into the section words which are not there, and I do not think that that is necessary in order to give a meaning to the section. In my view, this was at the time of the accident transmission machinery, and it was in motion, and, therefore, the provisions of s. 16 apply. There was no guard or fencing at the time, and an accident occurred. Prima facie there is a breach of s. 16 of the Act, although a proper guard had been supplied for the machine and was used when the machine was working for its normal purpose.

"shall be . . . constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced . . . are in motion or in use",

If I am wrong in the view which I have formed, that this was transmission machinery, then I think that it was dangerous machinery. There were belts and pulleys, usually worked by mechanical energy but which could be moved by hand. The occurrence of this accident shows that there was danger to someone who moved a belt by hand, for the little finger of the plaintiff's left hand was caught between belt and pulley. If it was a dangerous part of machinery, fencing was necessary under s. 14 (1) of the Act, and the requirements of s. 16 are equally applicable to a machine within the provisions of s. 14 as to transmission machinery within s. 13. Therefore, under one section or the other this part of machinery should have been fenced at the time the accident happened.

A further question arises, and that is on the submission made by counsel for the defendants that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence and it was that negligence that caused the accident. The learned judge, after dealing with the question of a breach of the safety provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, said:

"The much more difficult problem I have to face is whether there was such carelessness or want of skill as should properly be regarded as constituting negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and if so, whether that was a cause of the accident. I think that if it is to be regarded as constituting negligence it should be regarded as a cause, but the problem is whether it constitutes negligence or not. It is a very difficult question, and a matter mainly of degree obviously. On the whole, having regard to the factory conditions and what has been said about them in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (1), I think, on balance, it does not constitute negligence on his part. It is the kind of inadvertence, the kind of inaccurate operation which is to be expected of workmen in factories, in the conditions of hard work and noise and fatigue, and so on, which they have to encounter. On the whole, although it is a difficult question, I hold that there was no negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Therefore the cause of the injury is wholly ascribable to the breach of statutory duty."

When the plaintiff was asked about his occupation, he described himself as an upgraded fitter. [His LORDSHIP referred to evidence given by the plaintiff, and continued:] The law is clearly stated by LAWRENCE, J., in Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co. (2) and in passages from the speeches of LORD ATKIN and LORD WRIGHT in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (1). It is perfectly clear that one ought not too readily to find negligence against a workman in a factory. The decisions in those cases were, of course, before the passing of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, and the result of negligence on the part of an injured workman is not the same now as it would have been then. However, the test whether there was negligence on the part of the workman remains the same. It must be remembered that a workman in a noisy factory may do things which are foolish. He may cause an accident to himself or to someone else by inadvertence. But the plaintiff was an experienced fitter. He was not an ordinary workman in the factory, he was a man employed on work of adjustment and at the time of the accident he was doing something to the machine in the nature of repair or adjustment. He was a man fifty-one years of age who was being paid £10 a week because he was an experienced fitter, and he was engaged in a very simple operation of moving the face plate of the machine. One other man was working with him whose duty it was to tell him to stop when the face plate was in the correct position. Having given my best attention to what has been said in years gone by on the subject of negligence, and being, I hope, always slow to find a workman in a factory guilty of negligence, I have come to the conclusion that this workman was guilty of negligence. Had I been sitting as judge of first instance in this case I should have taken the view that this accident was very largely due to the workman's own negligent act. The judge had witnesses before him, and the only witness on this issue of negligence was really the plaintiff himself. The judge, although he felt considerable doubt, reached the conclusion that the plaintiff was not negligent. This court should hesitate before interfering with the view of a judge who sees and hears the witnesses when all that we see is a transcript of the evidence. I am inclined to think that with that in mind I should still have said that the plaintiff ought to have borne some considerable part, or, indeed, the greater part, of the responsibility for this accident, but one member of the court takes the same view of the position as PEARSON, J., and if there be a division of opinion in this court on that matter, I am satisfied that this court ought not to interfere with the view of the judge of first instance. For those reasons, I have reached the conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I deal first with the question of contributory negligence raised by the defendants. I confess that, having read the evidence only, I should be inclined to arrive at a conclusion that the accident was, to a very great extent, attributable to the negligence of the plaintiff. But in this matter one is bound to remember that the reading of the evidence is not enough. When considering the conduct of a workman in a factory the man himself has to be considered, and the learned judge who tried the case had in mind the observations of LAWRENCE, J., in Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co. (2) ([1934] 2 K.B. 140), approved by LORD ATKIN and LORD WRIGHT in Caswell's case (1):

" . . . the tribunal of fact has to take into account all the circumstances of work in a factory and that it is not for every risky thing which a workman in a factory may do in his familiarity with the machinery that a plaintiff ought to be held guilty of contributory negligence."

Having seen the plaintiff and having that passage in mind, PEARSON, J., came to the conclusion that he was not prepared to find the plaintiff guilty of negligence. For reasons which my Lord has given I feel that we ought not to disturb his finding, although in the cold light of the transcript it does look as if he and I would have arrived at a different conclusion if we had tried the case.

The other part of the case depends on the question whether or not the employers are in breach of the Factories Act, 1937, Part II, the material sections being s. 12 to s. 16, and the chief relevant sections being s. 13 and s. 16. The breach complained of is that the defendants failed constantly to maintain and keep in position the guards or casing while the machinery was in motion. The accident occurred when the machinery was being moved by the man's hand and not by mechanical energy. Counsel for the defendants very rightly says that in construing these sections one has to consider them as a whole and decide what is the proper meaning to be attached to particular words without necessarily confining oneself to their literal meaning. [His LORDSHIP read the material parts of s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14 of the Act of 1937, and continued:] It is clear from the wording of s. 12 (1), s. 13 (1), and s. 14 (1) that prime movers and transmission machinery are presumed to be dangerous, whereas in s. 14 parts of machinery other than prime movers and transmission machinery are mentioned which have to be shown to be dangerous. [His LORDSHIP read s. 16 of the Act of 1937, and continued:] The exception mentioned in s. 16 does not apply in this case. The accident happened when the guard had been removed in order that the plaintiff and another fitter could turn round the face plate and drill a hole in order to make an alteration in the set-up of the machine. Two holes had to be drilled, one on each side, and after one hole had been drilled the face plate of the machine had to be turned 180 degrees in order to get the machine in position to drill another hole. It was in performing that operation that the plaintiff pulled the belt.

The first argument put forward by the defendants was that on the facts as found by the learned judge, the power being off, the machinery was not transmission machinery at all. I think the argument was stated in this way, that, as no power was being transmitted from the prime mover, the transmission machinery ceased to be transmission machinery, and the regulations did not apply. That argument was not very strongly pressed, and I think counsel for the defendants recognised that it was a sound view of the sections and the definitions which I have read, that s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14 were descriptive of the machinery to which the sections were to apply and of the required safety precautions, and that when one speaks of transmission machinery, including various things by which the motion of a prime mover is transmitted, one is describing something by reference to the manner in which power is used to move the parts in the ordinary way, and the description is not limited to what is actually happening at a given moment. Therefore, in my view, there is no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion that this was transmission machinery. I think that s. 20 also supports that view:

" A woman or young person shall not clean any part of a prime mover . . . while the prime mover . . . is in motion . . . "

The transmission machinery remains transmission machinery whether the power is on or not, and that, I think, covers the position in this case.

The more serious argument put forward by the defendants was that, even if this is transmission machinery, yet it is not machinery "in motion or in use", within the meaning of the phrase as used in s. 16, and, therefore, there is no breach, because at no material time was the guard required to be on. It is not argued here that the machine was in use, but the question remains: "Was it in motion?", and this is the vital question. In so far as one can gather a general indication from these sections, their object is to prevent people being hurt by moving machinery. The word "motion" must obviously be given some limit in its interpretation. It cannot be interpreted literally. Counsel for the defendants reinforces his argument by referring to a Scottish case, Parvin v. Morton Machine Co. (3), which turned on s. 14 and s. 20 of the Act. I will read a passage from the judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD THOMSON) (1950 S.C. 378) which appears in Thorogood v. Van Den Berghs & Jurgens, Ltd. (4) ([1951] 1 All E.R. 688) and will explain the nature of the argument:

"At first blush I should have thought that the purpose of this part of the Factories Act was to lay down general provisions for ensuring the safety of the plant and equipment which is installed in the factory for the purposes of manufacturing whatever is the product of the factory and that the nature and character of the product was a separate matter, calling for separate treatment in appropriate cases. Indeed it is only where the product of the factory is machinery or machines that the problem arises. The argument is that the words 'any machinery' which occur in s. 14 (1) and 'any machine' which occur in s. 20 are unequivocal and adequate to cover the dough-brake and that, as the purpose of this part of the Act is the safety of the employees, we should lean to a construction which promotes safety. This argument seems to me to lay too much stress on the particular use of 'any' and to put out of view the general context in which the words 'any machinery' and 'any machine' are found. The significance of apparently general words must be governed by the setting in which they are found'."

He came to the conclusion that the words "any machinery", wide and general as they are, were not apt to cover machinery in the course of manufacture in the factory.

Counsel for the defendants used that case as an illustration of the point he was putting before this court, viz., that the word "motion" must not be translated absolutely literally, because if that is so it would cover, for example, the raising of the apparatus from the floor by crane, and that would clearly not be within the language of the section. I agree that the difficult question to be decided is where the line is to be drawn? One has to consider what effect the definitions contained in s. 152 of the Act have in construing s. 16, and, in particular, the words, "in motion or in use". I think the argument of counsel for the defendants may be put shortly in this way, that machinery is not in motion within the meaning of s. 16 if it is not in motion under the power derived from the prime mover, and that this is clear when one looks at the definition of "prime mover" in s. 152 (1). In my view, there would, apart from the definition, be no warrant for implying after the words, "are in motion or in use", the words "under mechanical power". The question is whether the definition drives one to do so. In my judgment, it does not so do. If one bears in mind that the definitions are merely describing the transmission machinery in the one case and the prime mover in the other, and describing them by reference to the manner in which they work, they do not, to my mind, cease to be transmission machinery and a prime mover because they are not at the material moment working in the manner contemplated by the definition in that the power is cut off. They can, in my view, still be in motion within the language of the section even though they are put into motion by the hand of the operator and not by the power. In those circumstances, I find that I agree with my Lord and with the learned judge that the machine was in motion, and that the regulations apply. I should, perhaps, add that I have no difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion as the learned judge, that if there is a breach of the regulations it was the cause of the accident.

The further point as to negligence at common law on the part of the employers has been kept open by counsel for the plaintiff without any elaborate argument, but I confess I feel in the same position as the learned judge, that it is by no means obvious to me that there is any evidence of negligence apart from the breach of statutory duty against the employers. For those reasons I agree that the appeal fails.

MORRIS, L.J.: I regret to find myself in this case unable to share the conclusions which have been expressed by my Lords. The circumstances of this case were special and particular, and the case depends on its own facts. The accident on this grinding machine happened at a time when it was dismantled, and when it had been out of action for some five or six weeks. The machine was not in use: it is not suggested that it was. Work was in progress on it in order to effect partly alteration and partly repair. The accident occurred to a fitter in whom was vested some discretion as to how he should operate.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the plaintiff's evidence in which the plaintiff described the condition of the machine, and said that the guard had been removed from the pulleys. The plaintiff had said that he had been given instructions to drill two holes in the face plate, and for that purpose used a pneumatic drill. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] The plaintiff described how the pneumatic drill was fixed in a stationary position. Two holes had to be drilled in the face plate, one hole being immediately above the other, and the positions of the holes had to be accurate. The result was that when one of the holes was drilled the face plate had to be turned a half-circle. Before the first hole was drilled the face plate had to be put into position. The plaintiff caused the correct position to be achieved by moving the face plate by pulling on the belt and causing the shaft on the main machine to revolve. He was one of three people doing work on this machine, who were all described as skilled workmen and were expected to do work of repair and adjustment. The plaintiff when questioned by the learned judge admitted that it was an ordinary occurrence in the course of his job as a fitter to pull on the belt of a pulley to rotate it. The photographs which have been put before us to demonstrate the working of this machine show that its purpose is to grind rollers. The rollers are put into the machine and are fixed to what is called the face plate. The face plate is caused to revolve at speed, and the grinding or polishing process is achieved by the part of the machine by which pressure is applied to the side of the roller as it is rotated at speed, the rotation being caused by electrical energy from a dynamo and being transmitted to the main part of the machine by means of belts. This accident occurred at a time when the machine was out of commission, when it had been dismantled and stripped down, and when work was being done on it by fitters who did not normally operate the machine.

My Lords have referred to the relevant sections of the Factories Act, 1937, and I do not, therefore, pause to read them. I think it is right to say that, while some of the sections impose a duty, s. 16 defines the duty. The matter was so expressed in Smith v. Morris Motors, Ltd. & Harris (5), and I will read a part of the judgment of LYNKEY, J. He says ([1949] 2 All E.R. 718):

"The effect of s. 16 is to indicate how and when the duty imposed under s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14 is to be carried out. That duty is to be carried out, so far as the provision of fencing is concerned, by providing fencing of substantial construction, by constantly maintaining the fencing, which means keeping it in good and efficient working order, and repair and also keeping the fencing in position while the parts required to be fenced or guarded are in motion or use, with certain exceptions."

In my view, those words clearly state the position. The exceptions to which the learned judge referred are the exceptions set out in s. 16, and it is not

A contended that they apply in the present case.

I have come to the conclusion that the belts and that part of the machine where the upper part of the belts are attached would be correctly described as transmission machinery, and I do not accept the submission of counsel for the defendants that those parts cease to be transmission machinery merely because they are not in motion. Section 16, which defines the duty, provides

B that:

"All fencing or other safeguards provided in pursuance of the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall be of substantial construction, and constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced or safeguarded are in motion or in use . . ."

C with an exception which does not apply. A consideration of s. 20 lends support to the view that the description of "transmission machinery" is one that still applies even though the transmission machinery is not in motion or in use. Counsel for the plaintiff has not submitted that the transmission machinery in this case was in use. It, therefore, seems to me that the question in this case resolves itself into the question: Was this transmission machinery "in motion"? The purpose of the transmission machinery was to transmit the motion of a

D prime mover. At the time of the accident the power was turned off, and there was no question of any operation of the prime mover. "Prime mover" is defined to mean:

E "... every engine, motor or other appliance which provides mechanical energy derived from steam, water, wind, electricity, the combustion of fuel or other source."

It is not necessary to express an opinion on the point, but it suffices to say that counsel for the plaintiff did not contend that the words "other source" included manual power. Transmission machinery is defined to mean,

F "every shaft, wheel, drum, pulley, system of fast and loose pulleys, coupling clutch, driving-belt, or other device by which the motion of a prime mover is transmitted to or received by any machine or appliance."

In this case there was no motion of the prime mover, there was no mechanical energy, there was nothing to transmit, and no transmission was taking place. What happened was that the plaintiff, in his discretion, thought that the right way to get the face plate in position was to pull on the belt. The point is a

G short one, and my opinion can be briefly expressed. It is unreal to say that the transmission machinery was in motion, and I do not think that in any practical sense it can be said to have been in motion. The facts in the present case do not, in my judgment, come within the scope, or the spirit, or the intention of the words, transmission machinery "in motion". For those reasons, I have reached the view that it was not shown here that there was

H any breach of statutory duty by the defendants. Our attention was called to certain phrases in some of the speeches in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (6), which seem consistent with the view that I have endeavoured to express.

As my Lords have said, counsel for the plaintiff stated at the end of his submissions that he desired to keep open the point that there was negligence on the part of the defendants, and that he could succeed on that ground even if he did not establish a breach of statutory duty. We have had no argument in regard to that matter. I am certainly not persuaded that any negligence was shown. I would, therefore, have allowed this appeal on the ground that there was no breach of statutory duty and that I am not satisfied that there was any negligence on the part of the defendants.

Had I been of the contrary opinion, then I would have had to consider the question whether there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and on this part of the case I share the conclusion reached by the learned judge. The guidance given by the House of Lords in Grant v. Sun Shipping Co., Ltd. (7) was expressed by LORD PORTER ([1948] 2 All E.R. 242) in these words:

"This matter is largely a question of fact and, if there was evidence from which a tribunal could fairly come to the conclusion that the pursuer was not himself negligent, and if the judge or jury before whom the case was tried came to that conclusion, I imagine your Lordships would not interfere with the decision. It is, I think, not in dispute that the decision has to be made in the light of the characteristics of the type of men affected."

Having re-read the evidence of the plaintiff, I form the view that he was not a very shrewd man and, perhaps, not very alert in answering questions. It seems to me that the note of the plaintiff's evidence revealed a man zealous in his work, and I think that what happened here was aptly described in the words of the learned judge as being "inadvertence" or "inaccurate operation". There was, perhaps, an error of judgment in the mode of operating at the particular moment, but I would not consider that it was an error amounting to negligence. I would, therefore, not have felt that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence. It seems to me that this unfortunate, but, happily, not serious, accident is just the sort of accident which should be covered by the provisions that are made in regard to industrial injuries.

Appeal dismissed.

THEOCHARIDES v. JOANNOU.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 28, 29, 30, May 1, 4, 1953.]

Practice—Shorthand note—Right of judge to require transcript—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 14 (3).

The discretion of a judge at a trial to require a transcript of the shorthand note of the evidence taken by the official shorthand writer is unfettered, except that the requirement is subject to appeal to the Court of Appeal, and the discretion is not affected by the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 14 (3) (b).

FOR THE LEGAL AID (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1950, reg. 14 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 5, p. 214.

Case referred to:

(1) Griffiths v. Howard, [1939] 3 All E.R. 56; 55 T.L.R. 814; Digest Supp.

WITNESS ACTION.

The plaintiff, a Cypriot, gave his evidence rapidly and volubly in broken English. On Friday, May 1, when the plaintiff had been giving evidence for two days, the learned judge, realising that his own note would be inadequate, informed the official shorthand writer that he would require a transcript of the plaintiff's evidence and of the evidence to be given by the defendant. As the plaintiff was an assisted person, his solicitor, instead of immediately authorising the cost of the transcript, referred the matter to the legal aid committee who requested that certain information should be supplied to the judge, and, when the trial was resumed on Monday, May 4, the judge was not supplied with a transcript.

Bell, Q.C., and Martin Roth for the plaintiff.

J. G. Strangman, Q.C., and M. Nesbitt for the defendant.

ROXBURGH, J.: This is an action between two Cypriot brothers relating to two restaurants. Both are legally aided. A shorthand note of the evidence is being taken under the scheme envisaged by R.S.C., Ord. 66A, r. 1, which is printed in THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1939, p. 1276 [in a note to R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 11]. It does not appear to be printed in the current edition. The note reads in part as follows:

"Heretofore, although shorthand notes of proceedings in the court below have been used in certain circumstances in the Court of Appeal . . . there has been no provision for the taking of 'official' shorthand notes of evidence or other proceedings in civil actions. Now, however, in a notice issued from the Lord Chancellor's Department provision is made for a note to be taken in practically every case. This notice is in the following form:—The scheme contemplated by ATKINSON, J.'s committee for official note-taking in all witness actions . . . in the courts of the Chancery and King's Bench Divisions will be in operation as from Oct. 12, 1937 . . . In the absence of special instructions of the judge, the Association [of Official Shorthand Writers, Ltd.] will depute one shorthand writer to attend each court to take a note of the evidence, summing-up and judgment. The fee for taking the note will be borne by public funds. The cost of transcripts for use during the hearing of the case will be borne by the parties, who will be entitled to make their own arrangements with the Association for the supply of transcripts. If the trial judge requires a transcript of any part of the evidence, the transcript required will, unless the judge otherwise directs, be provided and paid for by the plaintiff in the first instance, the cost being part of the costs in the cause."

It has been my practice to take in longhand only such note as appeared likely to be necessary for my purposes, realising that there might be cases in which it would turn out to be insufficient, but relying on what I believed to be my right to require a transcript of the whole or some part of the evidence if that event occurred. On balance, this leads to a large saving of costs, because it is seldom that my note is insufficient for my own purposes, whereas, if I adopted the policy of writing out everything in longhand in every case which might turn out to be material, in most cases a great deal of time would thus be wasted. For this practice I have today found good precedent in Griffiths v. Howard (1), an action concerning certain rights in watercress beds. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence on the first day, the learned judge sent a note to the plaintiff's solicitor by the usher of the court saying that he required a note of the evidence taken by the shorthand writer under the notice issued by the Lord Chancellor's Department. The solicitor instructed the shorthand writer to prepare a transcript, and it was supplied the next day. The case was ultimately settled. On taxation the taxing master said that he had no evidence before him that the judge had required a transcript within the meaning of the notice. SIMONDS, J., said that he had required a transcript, and he went on to say (55 T.L.R. 814):

"Accordingly the costs of it would be paid by the plaintiff in the first instance, and would be costs in the cause. The taxing master should be so informed. Where the request was made by the judge in court, it would automatically go on the shorthand writer's note, but if, as sometimes happened, it was made through the officer of the court or the usher after the court had risen, it would be the duty of counsel to draw the attention of the court to the fact and to ask for a direction that the costs of the note be made costs in the cause."

It will be observed that it is essential to the adequate working of this system that the judge's discretion as to requiring a transcript should be unfettered except that his requirement is subject to appeal to the Court of Appeal. I cannot share with any committee, however eminent, responsibility for the actual conduct of any particular case. If my right to require a transcript can be questioned otherwise than in the Court of Appeal, then the shorthand note is useless to me, though, no doubt, useful in the Court of Appeal. I must write down everything remotely relevant in longhand. In this case the plaintiff had already been in the witness box for two days. He speaks fast and volubly in broken English, clipping most words in modern Greek fashion. I came gradually to realise that my note would prove inadequate for my purpose. On Friday morning, May 1, I stated to the shorthand writer—and I have no doubt that he duly recorded it on his note—that I required a transcript of the plaintiff's evidence so far given and should require a transcript of the remainder of his evidence and one of the defendant's evidence. After the rising of the court I was informed by the official shorthand writer that no one was prepared to accept responsibility for his charges. I informed him that I would not pay them out of my Victorian salary and that he need not proceed with the transcript until someone would undertake to pay him for it. The plaintiff's solicitors then consulted the appropriate legal aid committee.

At this stage considerable misunderstanding seems to have arisen. I am by no means sure that the plaintiff's solicitor made it plain to the committee that I had already that morning required the transcript under the power to which I have referred. It is quite certain that he did not make plain to the committee all the purposes for which I required the transcript, and for that last matter he is in no sense to blame. I said that I should require the transcript to deliver judgment, but I did not think it proper to state (though in the abnormal circumstances that have arisen I think it proper to state it now) that I also required the transcript to compare what the plaintiff was going to say today with what he said last Thursday. That the solicitor had no reason to know, and, accordingly, he could not inform the committee of it. I have some reason to doubt whether the committee ever consciously intended to raise the issue which has arisen. What the committee appear to have thought is that I was in some way inquiring whether a transcript should be provided, which, of course, is not what I was doing or intended to do. I gave the direction on Friday morning, and that was the beginning and end of the matter so far as I am concerned. Whatever the committee understood or whatever the plaintiff's solicitor may have said to them, the fact of the matter is that the plaintiff's solicitor did not immediately authorise the expenditure and that the legal aid committee did not immediately authorise the expenditure, but, on the contrary, requested that certain information should be supplied to me.

In my judgment, my discretion to require a transcript is unfettered unless the Court of Appeal should hold that in a particular case I am acting arbitrarily or unreasonably. It is a question relating to the conduct of business in my own court. Apart from statute, no outside body, however distinguished, is entitled to send messages to a judge about a case which he is conducting. It seems to me that someone must have misunderstood the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 14 (3), which provides:

"Where it appears to the assisted person's solicitor necessary for the proper conduct of the proceedings to take or to apply to the court for leave to take any one or more of the following steps, namely . . . (b) to bespeak any transcript of shorthand notes of any proceedings . . . he shall (unless the certificate provides for the act in question to be done) apply to the appropriate area committee for authority so to do, and no payment shall be allowed on taxation for any such step taken without their approval."

I do not know whether the plaintiff's solicitor thinks the transcript necessary or not, but I am not prepared to discuss that matter either with him or with the committee. It seems to me that that regulation has no application at all to a case in which a judge directs or requires a transcript in the circumstances

A in which I have required a transcript in the present case. Therefore, I do not propose, at this stage, to state all my reasons. If the Court of Appeal require to know my reasons I will willingly state them, and I think I could show that the requirement was essential to the proper administration of justice and likely to save costs in the end.

I think that the whole matter is probably due to some misunderstanding.

B The area committee have treated me with every courtesy, but an important constitutional principle seems to me to be involved. I have no right to intervene in the question whether counsel are supplied with a transcript, but I shall require, if the case proceeds to its ultimate destination, both counsel to deal with the evidence in detail, and I would indicate the opinion that much time will inevitably be wasted if they each use their own notes (which, in the C difficult circumstances of this case, and, in particular, the difficulty of understanding at least one of the witnesses, may well differ) while I use a transcript. Nor am I concerned with the plaintiff's solicitor's position under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, though I may, perhaps, express the opinion that the costs of any transcript which I require must be made part of the costs of the action and it seems to me that he is entitled to recover them out of the

D legal aid fund pursuant to his authority from the legal aid committee to conduct the action for the plaintiff. What I decide is that, as the plaintiff has not yet ordered and accepted responsibility to pay for the transcript which I required on Friday morning, and as I require it before I can further proceed with the case, this action do stand over until the transcript is available for me, with liberty to apply to restore when it is available. As the plaintiff is an assisted person,

E I propose to reserve the costs of the adjournment.

Order accordingly.

CRABTREE v. CRABTREE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), April 29, 1953.]

Divorce—Desertion—Termination—Agreement to pay maintenance—“If [the spouses] shall so long live separate and apart from each other.”

A husband who had deserted his wife entered into an agreement with her under which he undertook “during the joint lives of himself and the wife, if they shall so long live separate and apart from each other” to pay weekly sums for the maintenance of herself and of the child of the marriage. The sums were to cease to be payable if the parties came together again or if the marriage was dissolved.

Held: the agreement merely defined the duration of the payments of maintenance and did not bind the parties to live separate and apart, and it did not, therefore, prevent the husband's desertion from running.

Dictum of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Lord Long of Wraxall v. Lady Long of Wraxall ([1940] 4 All E.R. 233), applied.

AS TO THE EFFECT OF A SEPARATION AGREEMENT ON DESERTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 657, para. 966, and p. 835, para. 1338; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 347-353, Nos. 2878-2915.

- (1) Long of Wraxall (Lord) v. Long of Wraxall (Lady), [1940] 4 All E.R. 230; 110 L.J.P. 17; 27 Digest, Replacement, 355, 2941.

APPEAL by the wife from a decision of Mr. Commissioner REWCASTLE on Nov. 24, 1952, whereby he dismissed the wife's petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion, holding that that desertion had ceased to run by reason of an agreement made between the parties which amounted to a separation agreement.

L. A. Pratt for the wife.

Petrie for the husband.

DENNING, L.J.: The parties married on Sept. 23, 1944, and there is one child, a girl born on June 17, 1945. In 1947 the husband left the home, and when the wife's mother went to try to get him back, he refused with some emphasis to return. In these circumstances he was clearly guilty of desertion, but the question is whether his desertion came to an end by reason of the terms of an agreement made on Jan. 3, 1948. The material clause of that agreement is cl. 1 which was as follows:

“The husband and the wife having for some time past lived separate and apart from each other and the wife having the custody of and control of the said child of the marriage, the husband agrees with the wife that he will during the joint lives of himself and the wife, if they shall so long live separate and apart from each other, pay to her for the support and maintenance of herself the weekly sum of £1 and for the maintenance of the said child the weekly sum of £1 until the said child attains the age of sixteen years.”

The wife agreed to maintain herself with the help of that allowance, and there was a clause whereby, if at any time the parties came together again or if the marriage were dissolved, the sum should cease to be payable.

The question is whether, as a result of that agreement, the desertion ceased to run. That is a question of interpretation. If it was an agreement binding the parties to live separate and apart it would stop the desertion running, but if it was only an agreement to pay maintenance it would not. In Lord Long of Wraxall v. Lady Long of Wraxall (1) it was held that an agreement to live separate and apart had brought the desertion to an end. SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1940] 4 All E.R. 233):

“ It appeared from the evidence of the appellant that the real purpose of the separation deed was, in the minds of both parties, to regulate the financial position and to make provision with regard to the child. If the deed had been confined to these matters, no difficulty would have arisen.”

- A SIR WILFRID GREENE there recognises that on or after separation the parties can regulate the financial position between them without bringing the desertion to an end. On its true interpretation, I think that the present agreement was such an agreement as SIR WILFRID GREENE had in mind. It is confined to maintenance. The words “ if they shall so long live separate and apart ” simply define the duration of the payment and do not amount to a bargain binding them to live separate and apart. The agreement does not stop the desertion from running. The petition should be granted and a decree nisi pronounced on the ground of the husband’s desertion.

- C HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The desertion began to run in November, 1947, and the only question which arises on this appeal is whether it was terminated on the execution of an agreement dated Jan. 3, 1948, which was entered into between the parties. The learned commissioner thought that, on its true construction, this agreement was a separation agreement, and, accordingly, that desertion ceased to run from the moment when the parties put their hands to it. I think the position is correctly set out in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 113, in this way:

- D “ A deed which contains no express or implied stipulation that the petitioner agrees to the respondent living apart will not prevent desertion from running.”

- E That there may be deeds of a kind which will not prevent desertion from running is plain from the passage from the judgment in Lord Long of Wraxall v. Lady Long of Wraxall (1) which my Lord has read. The words which were thought to stand in the way of the petitioning wife here are those which follow the agreement by the husband to pay—“ if they shall so long live separate and apart ”. If those words imply a stipulation that the wife agrees to the husband living apart from her, they prevent desertion from running, but otherwise they do not. In my judgment, on their true construction these words are merely a conditional clause defining the duration of the payment and do not imply such a stipulation, and they come within the exception which appears to have been contemplated by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Lord Long of Wraxall v. Lady Long of Wraxall (1). I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

HAZELL, WATSON & VINEY, LTD. v. MALVERMI.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), April 29, 30, May 1, 4, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Premises within the Acts—Change of identity—Premises originally not within 1939 Act—Damage by enemy action—Reduction of rateable value—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1) (a).

The defendant was tenant of premises consisting of a café on the ground floor, with a kitchen in the basement and three floors above. From 1940 onwards he had used the first floor of the premises as living accommodation. In 1942 the defendant's lease expired, but he held over and eventually a new tenancy was negotiated between him and the landlords for the term of one year, to continue thereafter as a quarterly tenancy. In this agreement the defendant covenanted "not to use the premises other than and except as a café and dining room only." The defendant continued to live on the premises, and, with knowledge of this, the landlords accepted rent from him. The premises were damaged by bombs in 1940, so that two party walls cracked on the third floor, some ceilings were broken and bulging, and certain window sashes and panes of glass were broken. The rateable value of the premises at the material times was as follows:—Apr. 6, 1931, £147, reduced to £132 and to £117 in March and October, 1941, due to the falling off in trade during the war, and in August, 1948, the figure of £147 was restored. In 1950 the rateable value was reduced to £96 in view of the war damage to the premises, this being the first assessment which had taken that damage into consideration. Notice to quit was served on the defendant, expiring on Sept. 29, 1951, but the defendant continued in possession. In an action for possession,

HELD: (i) there was no ground on which the tenancy agreement should be rectified so as to exclude the clause which restricted the user of the premises, but in the circumstances the landlords, by accepting the rent with knowledge, had assented to the user of the premises as a dwelling-house and the agreement had become an agreement for the tenancy of a dwelling-house.

Observations of EVERSLED, L.J., and DENNING, L.J., in Wolfe v. Hogan ([1949] 1 All E.R. 574, 575), applied.

(ii) for damage to premises to amount to a change of their identity, serious damage alone was not sufficient; the facts must be such that it could be said that in substance the house under consideration had ceased to be the same house as that with which it was being compared; there was here no such degree of damage; as a result the appropriate date on which to calculate the rateable value for the purposes of the Rent Acts, was Apr. 6, 1939, on which date the rateable value of the premises in question was £147; and, therefore, the defendant was not entitled to the protection of the Acts and the plaintiffs were entitled to possession.

Per curiam: Even if there had been a change of identity caused by war damage the first assessment of the premises after the war damage had occurred was in 1948, when the rateable value was restored to £147, and that was the appropriate assessment for determining whether the premises came within the Acts, even though that assessment did not take into account the damaged condition of the premises.

ACTION for possession.

B The defendant, Luigi Malvermi, was the tenant of premises at 54 Long Acre, London, consisting of a café on the ground floor with a kitchen in the basement and three upper floors. On Oct. 1, 1928, the premises were let by one Arthur Sergeant, as lessor, for a term of fourteen years from Sept. 28, 1928, to Giuseppe Giacomazzi, Severino Berzolla, and Settembrino Berzolla, as tenants, and by the terms of the lease the tenants were permitted to use the premises or part of them as living accommodation. On Apr. 2, 1931, the unexpired portion of the lease was assigned to the defendant and the two Berzollas. The first, second and third floors were then being used as living accommodation. By November, 1940, due to enemy attacks on London, the two Berzollas and their families had left the premises, and on Nov. 14, 1940, the defendant began to live on the first floor. On Sept. 8 and Nov. 1, 1940, the premises were damaged by bombs, and the landlord agreed to abate the rent which had been £300 per annum to £160 per annum. On Sept. 28, 1942, the lease of Sept. 28, 1928, expired by effluxion of time, but the defendant held over at the reduced rent of £160 per annum. In January, 1943, a Miss Tweed purchased the reversion of the lease from Mr. Sergeant, and in February, 1943, on her instructions, Mr. Spagnoletti, an estate agent, opened negotiations with the defendant for a new lease, and, by a letter of Mar. 10, 1943, offered him a term of one year and thereafter a quarterly tenancy—"You to be responsible for payment of all rates, taxes and other outgoings and to keep the property in good tenantable repair, in other words, on the same terms as were contained in the former lease . . ." The lease was executed on May 14, 1943, cl. 10 containing a covenant by the defendant "not to use the premises other than and except as a café and dining room only".

F The lease was assigned by Miss Tweed to the plaintiffs on Nov. 10, 1943, and Mr. Spagnoletti continued to manage the premises as agent for the plaintiffs. The defendant continued in occupation of the premises, and, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs' agents, used the first floor as living accommodation. The agents, however, accepted rent from him until they served on him a notice to quit on June 22, 1951.

G The war damage to the premises consisted in the cracking of two party walls in the front room on the third floor, cracked plaster, bulging and broken ceilings, broken window sashes, and some panes of glass missing.

The rateable values of the premises at various periods during the tenancies were as follows:—On Apr. 6, 1931, the rateable value was increased to £147. On Mar. 7, and Oct. 1, 1941, there were reductions to £132 and then to £117.

H These reductions were made because of the general falling off in trade during the war. On Aug. 3, 1948, the figure was restored to £147. The valuation of premises for rating purposes was transferred to the valuation officer of the Inland Revenue department in 1950 and a proposal was put forward that the rateable value of the premises should be reduced owing to the effect of war damage. As a result the rateable value of the premises was reduced later in the year to £96, this being the first assessment which had taken into consideration the war damage to the premises.

M. R. Hoare for the plaintiffs.

Wilson, Q.C., and S. N. Bernstein for the defendant.

McNAIR, J.: This case raises the following questions. First: Does cl. 10 of the tenancy agreement, which contains a covenant by the tenant "not to use the premises other than and except as a café and dining room only", have the result that the premises comprised in the agreement were not let as a separate dwelling-house within the meaning of s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920? Secondly: If so, have the plaintiffs, by accepting rent from the defendant with knowledge that he was using part of the premises for the purpose of living accommodation, assented and agreed to such user so as, in effect, to convert the tenancy into a new contract for the letting of a separate dwelling-house, having regard to the fact that s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, provides that the application of the principal Acts by virtue of this section to any dwelling-house

"shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes . . ."?

Thirdly: If the answer to the first question—the question of construction—be in the affirmative, and the answer to the second question—that as to the assent to the user of the house as a dwelling-house—is in the negative, the defendant claims that the tenancy agreement should be rectified so that on its true construction as rectified it would contain no prohibition against the defendant occupying the premises in part at least as a dwelling-house. Fourthly: If the tenancy agreement, either by reason of the plaintiffs' acceptance of the defendant's user of part of the premises for the purpose of living accommodation or by reason of the tenancy agreement being rectified, is to be treated as a letting of a separate dwelling-house, was the rateable value of the premises at the appropriate date less than £100 so that the Rent Acts would be applied by virtue of s. 3 of the Act of 1939? The answer to the last question depends in turn on two issues of fact: (a) Had the premises, by virtue of the damage they received by enemy action during the war, changed their identity so as to be different from the premises bearing the same description in the relevant valuation list, which, on Apr. 6, 1939 (the appropriate date for London under s. 3) had a rateable value in excess of £100, and (b) If there was such change of identity after Apr. 6, did the first assessment of the premises after that date, or after the change of identity, show a rateable value below £100 per annum?

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] In as much as there is a plea for rectification, the defendant alleging that cl. 10 should be deleted from the tenancy agreement and the tenancy agreement re-written so that on its true construction it permitted the use of the premises as a dwelling-house, it is convenient that I should at this stage state my conclusions on that matter. The defendant, in support of his plea, relies in particular on the letter of Mar. 10, 1943, from Mr. Spagnoletti, in which the offer of the tenancy is made "on the same terms as were contained in the former lease", which, the defendant says, means "on the terms that living in the house was permitted". Looking at that letter purely as a matter of construction, I have very grave doubts whether Mr. Spagnoletti ever had that intention in mind at that time. He was directing his mind more to summarising the lease generally and pointing out two particular matters of variation which had been negotiated, but, in my judgment, on the evidence it is plain that no case for rectification can be made out. I bear in mind the classic statement of the matter in the judgment of SIMONDS, J., in Crane v. Hegeman-Harris Co., Inc. (1). I need not read it in detail, but I point out that in any case it is extremely difficult to get rectification where the matter has been dealt with through professional advisers, as in this case. The matter, however, does not rest there, because on the evidence it is quite clear that Mr. Hawkins, the solicitor who prepared the draft agreement, stated that cl. 10 was inserted by him deliberately to secure that the premises would be used for business purposes, and so be outside the protection of the Rent Acts, in view of the lessors' desire to resume possession of No. 54 at such time as suited their re-building programme. The defendant, on the other hand, left the whole matter in the hands of his solicitors, whom he trusted implicitly, and who, as stated above, accepted the draft tenancy agreement, with this cl. 10 in it, without objection. Whether or not the lessors' solicitor was right in his view of the law that cl. 10 would keep the letting outside the Rent Restrictions Acts is immaterial for present purposes. Viewing the evidence as a whole, I have no hesitation in saying that the defendant's claim for rectification is not made out.

Under the tenancy agreement of May, 1943, the defendant continued in occupation of the whole of the building. I am satisfied that Mr. Spagnoletti, who was managing the property, first for Miss Tweed and subsequently for the plaintiffs, knew that the defendant was living on the premises, and accepted the rent from him with this knowledge, though he told me—and I accept this—he was not shown a copy of the tenancy agreement, and had not in mind this cl. 10 restricting the user. In 1947, at the instance of the plaintiffs, Mr. Spagnoletti attempted unsuccessfully to persuade the defendant to leave the premises and give up possession, and on this occasion he reported to Col. Viney, a director of the plaintiff company, that the defendant was living on the premises and was unwilling to give them up as he had nowhere to go. Notwithstanding this, the plaintiffs continued to accept rent from the defendant until the notice to quit was given on June 22, 1951.

The first of the four points which, I stated in opening, were raised by this case related to the question of construction, namely, whether the effect of cl. 10 of the tenancy agreement was to restrict the use of the premises as a whole to their use as a coffee room and dining room only. Counsel for the defendant has urged that, if cl. 10 is given that construction, it is inconsistent with cl. 12, which contemplates that, with the landlord's permission, part of the premises might be sub-let, and, on the facts, he says that the only division that could be made would be between the business premises and the living accommodation. He has also urged that it is inconsistent with the description of the parcels as "the shop, messuage or dwelling-house". For my part, I see no reason for construing this clause otherwise than according to its express language, namely, that it contains a covenant by the tenant "not to use the premises"—which are the premises as a whole—"other than and except as a coffee and dining room only". The construction which the defendant contends for involves reading into cl. 10 words which are not there, namely, "in so far as it is used for business purposes". I think, accordingly, that on its true construction this lease did provide for the limited user of the whole of the premises merely for coffee and dining room purposes and did not permit that any part of the premises should be used as a dwelling-house.

Having already early in my judgment stated that I did not feel that any case for rectification had been made out, the next question is whether, by their conduct since 1943, the landlords can be taken to have assented to the use of these premises as a dwelling-house, or part of them, so that there is in effect a new contract permitting such use. The guiding case on this kind of topic is Wolfe v. Hogan (2), and the passages from which I get guidance are to be found in the judgments of EVERSLED, L.J., and DENNING, L.J. EVERSLED, L.J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 574):

"Again I wish to make it quite plain that I am saying nothing which should be taken as indicating that, if a tenant does change the user and creates a dwelling-house out of what was formerly a shop, and if that fact is fully known to and accepted by the other party to the contract (whether or not there is a prohibition), the result may not very well be that there will then be inferred a contract to let as a dwelling-house, although it may be a different contract in essentials from the contract which was originally made and expressed."

DENNING, L.J., said (ibid., 575):

"Indeed, in the case of a continuing breach the acceptance of rent after knowledge is only a bar to a claim for forfeiture if it goes on for so long or is accepted in such circumstances that it can be inferred that the landlord has not merely waived the breach but has also affirmatively consented to the tenant continuing to use the premises as he has done . . ."

The learned lord justice continues with a warning against paying too much attention to the mere acceptance of rent. I am quite satisfied that the landlords for a considerable time before they gave the notice to quit knew perfectly well that their tenant was continuing to live in these premises in order that he might be able to run his café business, that they were content to accept that position, and that, when they continued to allow him to stay there after, in 1947, they had tried unsuccessfully to persuade him to leave, they must be taken to have assented to his using the premises as a dwelling-house.

Accordingly, when I approach the fourth question which I stated, it is on the basis that the tenancy agreement has, by the landlord's action, become a tenancy agreement for a dwelling-house. That being the factual position, one has to consider whether there had been at Apr. 6, 1949, such a change of identity in the premises that one can say that the appropriate date for the purposes of s. 3 of the Act of 1939 is not Apr. 6, 1939, but is some later date after the war when the identity was changed. I have been referred to a number of cases on this question of change of identity of a house, by reason either of structural change or of damage. The question sometimes arises in connection with the apportionment of the standard rent, which is not quite the same problem as I have to consider here, although it may well be that the principles are the same. I think the only case to which I have been referred where the critical question has been: What is the date of the first assessment after the change of identity? is Eyre v. Haynes (3), where the Court of Appeal (SCOTT, MACKINNON and TUCKER, L.JJ.) dismissed an appeal from the county court judge who had held that on the facts before him the premises which had been damaged by enemy action had not changed their identity. It appears from that report that before the war the house was rated at £113 per annum, and was, therefore, outside the Act, but on Mar. 8, 1943, the tenant made a new agreement with the landlord at a reduced rent, and in August of that year the rateable value was reduced to £76 per annum, which, if it is the appropriate rateable value for the purposes of the Rent Acts, would make the Acts applicable to that tenancy. The Court of Appeal refused to disturb the finding of fact by the learned judge that the damage was not enough to prevent the house remaining the same house as before the damage.

I need not go through the cases in detail to which I have been referred, such as R. v. Sidmouth Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sellek (4), Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (5), and Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Sommerfeld (6), those being cases where the primary question at least was the apportionment of the standard rent. It is quite clear that the principle one has to apply is that it is not sufficient that there has been serious damage to a house; the facts must be such that one can say that in substance the house under consideration has ceased to be the same house as that with which it is being compared. Identity may be changed, of course, although the four walls and the roof still stand, by reason of conversion of the interior of the premises into flats or matters of that kind. Again, identity may be changed by the addition of some new structure to the house, such as a garage. But I have been referred to no case in which it has been held that the mere fact that the premises have become damaged by enemy action, even though seriously damaged, is sufficient in itself to cause this notional change of identity. The description of the premises given by a surveyor who made a survey in May, 1943, does not, to my mind, indicate anything at all approaching a change of identity. The most serious damage there referred to is the cracking of two party walls close to the front wall on the third floor in the front room. In the other rooms the plaster is cracked, the ceilings are bulging and broken, and there are a few instances of broken window sashes and three or four panes of glass missing. If it is to be said that every house in London that received damage of that nature by enemy action during the war changed its identity or ceased to be the same house as it was before, that would be a conclusion which, in my judgment, it would be quite unreasonable to come to. I am satisfied that the effect of the damage to this building, which was, undoubtedly, substantial, was sufficient to make the second and third floors unusable and uninhabitable by any reasonable standards until they were repaired, though I am not saying that their state was not such that many people in May, 1943, might have been glad to have the shelter afforded by them. The fact that the upper floors were not used was, as I see the position, primarily because the defendant did not desire to use them. He had a perfect right under his lease to use them, although it may be that, if he had used the upper floors, the landlords might then have had to consider whether the rent should be reviewed. The conclusion I have come to shortly is that the defendant has not established that there was any change of identity.

That strictly renders it irrelevant for me to consider the question of the change in the rateable value, but, if it be material, it is sufficient for me to say that, first, as a matter of law, I think that when the court has to find the rateable value of the house for the purposes of these Acts, it is confined to looking at the rateable value as shown in the valuation list, and is not at liberty to speculate whether that valuation was right. Parliament has made the rateable value as shown in the valuation list the criterion. Secondly, I think it is quite clear that the first assessment of these premises after the war or after the new tenancy was created in May, 1943, was the assessment in August, 1948, when the rateable value was restored to the same figure as it was at before the war, and that, though it is true that the first assessment after the war which took account of the war damaged condition was that made in May, 1950, that is not to say that the assessment made in August, 1948, was not an assessment of the rateable value of the building at that time even though account was not then taken of its physical condition. Therefore, if it had been proved that there had been a change of identity, and, accordingly, it had been necessary to consider the date of the first assessment after that change of identity, I would have been forced to the conclusion that the relevant assessment was that of August, 1948. It follows that, in my judgment, the plaintiffs are entitled to possession.

JOHN HUDSON & CO., LTD. v. KIRKNESS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Wear and tear—Balancing charge—Wagons of coal merchants—Vesting in British Transport Commission—"Sale"—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 17 (1)—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), s. 29, s. 30 (1).

On Jan. 1, 1948, railway wagons which until that date had been owned by the taxpayers and had been requisitioned by the Minister of Transport under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 53, vested in the British Transport Commission under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 29. Under s. 30 of the Act, the commission became liable to pay compensation in respect of the wagons to the taxpayers, the compensation being determined "by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI to" the Act. The amount of compensation was substantially higher than the written-down value of the wagons for income tax purposes as appearing in the taxpayers' books. The taxpayers had received allowances under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and an assessment was made on the taxpayers under the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1), in order to give effect to a balancing charge in respect of a sum equal to the amount of the said allowances.

HELD: the transfer of the wagons under s. 29 of the Act of 1947 was not a sale at common law, and, having regard to the method of determining compensation under s. 30, was not a compulsory purchase but a compulsory acquisition and transfer, and, therefore, the wagons were not machinery or plant which had been "sold" within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945, and no balancing charge was required to be made on the taxpayers under that sub-section.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayers were coal merchants, who owned railway wagons used for the transport of coal in which they and subsidiary companies were dealing. They had not at any time manufactured or dealt in wagons or before 1939 hired out wagons. In pursuance of a notice (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1085) of Sept. 3, 1939, the Minister of Transport requisitioned the wagons under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 53. In June, 1940, an agreement was reached as to the terms of the requisition to which the taxpayers and other wagon owners were parties. Under the agreement the government undertook the repair and maintenance of the wagons at their own cost, but not replacement.

A They were, therefore, not responsible for depreciation and wear and tear, the burden of wear and tear being conceded to fall on the taxpayers. During the period of requisition the taxpayers did not carry on a trade of hiring out coal wagons separate from the trade of coal merchants. On Jan. 1, 1948, the property in the requisitioned wagons was transferred to and vested in the British Transport Commission under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 29, and the taxpayers in due course received compensation in respect of them under s. 30 of that Act.

B The amount of the compensation was substantially higher than the written-down value of the wagons for income tax purposes as appeared in the taxpayers' books and the written-down value was substantially lower than the original cost of the wagons. The taxpayers were assessed for 1948-49 under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £29,021, to give effect under the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1), to a balancing charge of that amount,

C on a sum representing, except for £963 referable to matters not in dispute, the excess of the original cost over the written-down value. The taxpayers appealed. They contended, inter alia, that the operation by which the wagons vested compulsorily in the British Transport Commission under s. 29 of the Act of 1947 did not fall within any of the events specified in s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945, and, in particular, that the wagons were not "sold" within the meaning of para. (a) of that sub-section and, therefore, no balancing charge could be raised in respect thereof. The Crown contended that the transaction was a sale within the meaning of para. (a) of the sub-section and that a balancing charge, therefore, was required to be made. The commissioners held that the transaction was a sale and that the balancing charge was properly made and they dismissed the appeal. The taxpayers appealed.

E UPJOHN, J.: This is an appeal by the taxpayers against an assessment made on them for 1948-49 under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £29,021, in order to give effect to a balancing charge on them under the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1). The taxpayers are coal merchants, and in 1947 they owned in connection with their business 663 railway wagons, which had been under requisition to the Ministry of Transport from 1939. That fact is relevant only in that it brings the matter within the Transport Act, 1947, s. 29, referred to later, and in connection with a second point which depends

F on the Finance Act, 1936, s. 22 (2), which the taxpayers are precluded from arguing in this court by reason of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Fifield (Inspector of Taxes) (1), but which they formally reserve for argument should this case go to a higher court.

G The point I have to consider is purely one of the construction of certain Acts. Under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 29, on Jan. 1, 1948, the property in the taxpayers' railway wagons was transferred to and vested in the British Transport Commission. It is argued by the Crown, and was so held by the Special Commissioners, that that transfer was a sale for the purposes of making a balancing charge under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1). The general object of that section appears to be this. If machinery or plant

H has been depreciated in the taxpayers' books and the appropriate income tax allowances have been made, and the machinery or plant is subsequently sold at a higher price than its depreciated price, then the excess of the one over the other is subject to a balancing charge on which income tax can be levied. On the other hand, if the price for which the machinery or plant is disposed of is less than its written-down price, an allowance is to be made to the taxpayers. Section 17 (1) of the Act of 1945 provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day [Apr. 6, 1946*] any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not; or (b) the machinery or plant, whether still in use or not, ceases to belong to the person carrying on the trade by reason of the coming to an end of a foreign concession; or (c) the machinery or plant is destroyed; or (d) the machinery or plant is put out of use as being worn out or obsolete or otherwise useless or no longer required, and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act referred to as ‘a balancing allowance’ or ‘a balancing charge’) shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis period for which that event occurs.”

By sub-s. (3):

“If the sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys exceed the amount, if any, of the said expenditure still unallowed as at the time of the event, a balancing charge shall be made, and the amount on which it is made shall be an amount equal to the excess or, where the said amount still unallowed is nil, to the said moneys.”

The Special Commissioners seem to have thought that that reference to “compensation moneys” was a reference to a sale, and that was an element, I think, which induced them to come to the conclusion that the transfer under the Act of 1947 was a sale. But the definition of “sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys” in s. 68 (1) shows that the words “compensation moneys” are inserted to deal with a case in which a foreign concession has come to an end, or in which there has been some loss to the plant and compensation by way of damages or otherwise is paid. Therefore, those words do not assist in one way or the other.

It is common ground that the sole point I have to consider is whether the transfer to the Transport Commission falls within s. 17 (1) (a), i.e., whether there has been a sale. The Transport Act, 1947, s. 29, dealing with railway wagons, provides:

“Where, immediately before the date of transfer, any privately-owned railway wagon is under requisition by virtue of an exercise of the powers in that behalf conferred by reg. 53 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939—(a) the property in that wagon shall vest in the commission on the date of transfer, free from any mortgage or other like incumbrance, and the requisition shall then cease; and (b) the Crown shall not be liable for any compensation under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, or otherwise in respect of any damage to the wagon occurring during the period of requisition”.

By s. 30 (1):

“Where under the last preceding section the property in any wagon vests in the commission, the commission shall, subject to the provisions of the three next succeeding sub-sections, pay as compensation in respect thereof an amount determined, by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI to this Act.”

By sub-s. (6):

“No compensation, other than that payable under this section, shall be payable in respect of the vesting, under the last preceding section, of the property in any wagon in the commission."

* See Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 18.

By s. 31 (1):

A "Subject to the provisions of this section, the compensation payable by the commission in respect of a privately-owned wagon vesting in them on the date of transfer shall be paid to the person who, immediately before the date of transfer, was the owner of the wagon."

By s. 32 (1), dealing with the payment of compensation:

B "The amount payable by way of compensation in respect of a wagon the property in which vests in the commission on the date of transfer shall be satisfied in the manner provided by Part VI of this Act by the issue to the person entitled thereto of British transport stock."

C Schedule VI makes provision for compensation for the acquisition of privately-owned wagons, including one, undoubtedly, very sensible provision when many thousands of railway wagons are being acquired. The compensation depends on the principle of a sliding scale governed entirely by the year in which the wagon was built, and in accordance with its specification, i.e., its weight and its tare. Thus, if the wagon was built in 1946 and was a ten-ton wagon, the amount to be paid by way of compensation was £248. It did not matter whether the wagon was in an excellent or a very bad state of repair.

D The taxpayers contended that that acquisition of railway wagons by the British Transport Commission cannot properly be described as "a sale" for the purposes of s. 17 (1). A sale at common law is defined in BENJAMIN'S SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY, 2nd ed., (prepared by the author himself) p. 1, as follows:

E "By the common law a sale of personal property was usually termed 'a bargain and sale of goods'. It may be defined to be a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money. Hence it follows that, to constitute a valid sale, there must be a concurrence of the following elements, viz.: (1) parties competent to contract: (2) mutual assent: (3) a thing, the absolute or general property in which is transferred from the seller to the buyer; and (4) a price in money paid or promised. That it requires parties competent to contract and mutual assent in order to effect a sale is manifest from the general principles which govern all contracts."

F The Crown has submitted that a transfer of property and payment of a price are sufficient to constitute a sale, and that mutual assent or consensus ad idem is not necessary. It is pointed out that a sale may be wider and have more far-reaching effects than a contract of sale. A sale itself, it is said, need not have mutual assent. The Crown concedes that there could not properly be said to be any mutual assent in the transfer in 1947 or 1948, and it did not attempt to support a finding by the commissioners that everyone must be presumed to have assented to the Act of Parliament. I cannot accept this contention of the Crown. A sale is really a shorthand way of referring to a bargain and sale, and at common law there cannot be a sale without a bargain. It follows that mutual assent is necessary. Therefore, it seems to me that what happened here cannot possibly be described as a sale at common law.

H However, that does not necessarily end the matter in favour of the taxpayers because the Crown says: "In any event here is a compulsory purchase", and that connotes a compulsory sale, which is a sale within s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945. The taxpayers do not concede that a compulsory sale would necessarily be within the Act, but submit that, when the Transport Act is properly construed, the transaction cannot be even described as a compulsory purchase or a compulsory sale. The vesting of compulsory purchase powers in various people is a familiar part of our law. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, an early and typical illustration, contains elaborate provisions for the ascertainment of price, for the matter to be referred to a jury where it has been impossible to agree, for payment in proper cases of the purchase money into court, for execution of conveyances, and, if necessary, for the execution of a deed-poll by the purchasing company where the vendor refuses or is unable to execute a deed. The Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, also contains elaborate provisions for the vesting of property and for the ascertainment of the price by a panel of arbitrators. In the Transport Act, 1947, itself, s. 8 provides:

"The Minister may authorise the commission to purchase compulsorily any land which they require for any purpose connected with the discharge of their functions, and the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (except s. 2 thereof) shall apply as if the commission were a local authority within the meaning of that Act and as if this Act had been in force immediately before the commencement of that Act."

In my judgment, the question is really one of construction of the Transport Act, 1947, i.e., whether the provisions of s. 29 and s. 30 can properly be described as effecting a compulsory purchase and a compulsory sale. Counsel for the Crown referred me to Great Western Ry. Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), a stamp duty case, and to Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3). But I do not find in either of those cases any principles laid down as to the proper canons of construction to apply in this case, and, therefore, I forbear to mention them in greater detail. In s. 29 of the Act of 1947 there is a vesting, and by s. 30 compensation, not a price, is to be paid, and that compensation is to be a fixed sum according to the age and type of wagon and has no relation to the actual worth of the wagon. In my judgment, it is not a proper use of legal language to describe such a transaction as a compulsory purchase. No doubt, Parliament could have dealt with the matter by way of compulsory purchase, but, in my opinion, it has not done so. It has dealt with the matter by way of compulsory acquisition and compulsory transfer of the property in the wagons to the commission and the payment of compensation. That cannot, in my judgment, properly be described as a compulsory purchase and a compulsory sale. It is a compulsory acquisition.

One further point taken by the Crown depended on the Finance Act, 1948, s. 34 and s. 35. It is suggested that those two sections show that Parliament thought that the foregoing provisions in the Transport Act, 1947, constituted a sale for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1). In so far as it is relevant at all, s. 34 appears to me to support the case of the taxpayers rather than the case of the Crown. Section 35 does seem to proceed on the basis that a balancing charge under s. 17 would arise on a transfer of property to the British Transport Commission, but, in my judgment, that is not an element which I can properly take into account. The fact that Parliament may have proceeded on an erroneous assumption as to the effect of a taxing Act is no ground for construing that Act in a manner adverse to the taxpayer. That is well shown by Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (4), in which LORD RADCLIFFE said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 544):

"What it comes to is this. Parliament has not made any enactment that requires or authorises the making of the allowances now claimed. It has not declared the law to be that such allowances are proper deductions. The most that can be said is that it is fairly certain that those who framed the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30, believed that such allowances ought to be given or were in fact being given (which is not always quite the same thing in this field). But if that is all that can be said it is, with all respect to the Court of Appeal, a misuse of words to say that the Law Courts ought to give effect to the 'intention' of Parliament that overseas excess profits tax should be allowed. The beliefs or assumptions of those who frame Acts of Parliament cannot make the law. Section 30 will be just as much effective in those cases when it does operate as it would be if overseas excess profits tax were not, in general, an allowable deduction, for wherever it operates it operates under the authority given by Parliament in that Act and not otherwise. This is not the first occasion on which a somewhat similar problem has been presented to your Lordships' House, and, in face of the abiding complexity of income tax legislation, I do not suppose that it will be the last. But if the House felt no difficulty in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ayrshire Employers Mutual Insurance Asscn., Ltd. (5) in disregarding the plain, though mistaken, assumption of the legislature as to the prevailing law, I do not think that your Lordships need feel even as much embarrassment in the present case."

B That seems to me abundantly to cover the argument that was addressed to me on the Finance Act, 1948, s. 35.

In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, there has been no sale in this case for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1) (a). Accordingly, this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

The wife denied the alleged adultery, but pleaded, in the alternative, that, if she had committed adultery, her husband's conduct had conduced to it, and she cross-prayed for a decree on the ground of the husband's cruelty. The wife filed a discretion statement, admitting adultery with one man. On Oct. 31, 1952, the husband's petition was dismissed and the wife was granted a decree on her cross-prayer, the court's discretion being exercised in her favour. HELD: (i) the general rule that fresh evidence will not be admitted unless either it was not available to the party seeking to use it at the trial, or that reasonable diligence would not have made it so available, or that the fresh evidence, if true, would have had or have been likely to have had a determining influence in the court below, is applicable to matrimonial as to other cases, and, therefore, the new evidence would not be admitted, nor a new trial, at which it could be adduced, ordered.

(ii) in custody proceedings, however, new evidence should not be excluded merely because it did not form part of the material on which the issues of divorce were determined, for to do so would result in preventing APPEAL by the husband against a decision of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated Oct. 31, 1952, and MOTION for leave to adduce new oral evidence of the deponents to those affidavits.

The husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The wife, by her answer, denied the adultery alleged in the petition, but alleged, in the alternative, that, if she had committed adultery, that adultery had been conducted to by the husband's conduct, and she cross-prayed for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty. The wife filed a discretion statement. On Oct. 31, 1952, COLLINGWOOD, J., dismissed the husband's petition, and, exercising his discretion in her favour, granted the wife a decree on her cross-prayer. The husband now appealed and moved for leave to adduce new evidence, tending to show that the wife had committed adultery with another man and that she had committed perjury in her discretion statement. The husband's motion was supported by affidavits of the proposed witnesses, but the Court of Appeal, having read these affidavits de bene esse, considered that the general rule laid down in Shedden v. Patrick & A.-G. (6) and other cases had not been satisfied, that is to say, that it had not been shown (i) that the proposed fresh evidence was not available to the husband at the trial or that reasonable diligence would not have made it so available, and (ii) that the proposed fresh evidence, if true, would have had, or would have been likely to have had, a determining influence on the court below. Counsel for the husband, however, submitted that the rule should not be so strictly applied in matrimonial causes. E F G H

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: Counsel for the husband raised this formidable point, that, since the court has a particular interest in matrimonial causes and in the sanctity of marriage, the general rule is not or should not, be so strictly applied in matrimonial causes. It is clear that there is no direct authority to that effect. Counsel referred us to a dictum of COTTON, L.J., in Howarth v. Howarth (1) and to Sanders v. Sanders (2), and also to what was said of the latter case in the Privy Council recently in Leeder v. Ellis (3), but I think the most forceful judicial utterance on this matter comes from the decision of this court delivered by myself in Prince v. Prince (4). In that case the court had to consider the precise construction of r. 36 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, and, in particular, what was the exact significance of the phrase "where no error of the court at the hearing is alleged", and the question was whether the application for a re-hearing under that rule had been rightly rejected by the Divisional Court. We thought that it had. The present matter, therefore, was not directly under consideration, but in the course of the judgment, which involved a historical review of the rule, reference was made to a judgment of LANGTON, J., in Winter v. Winter (5). One paragraph of my judgment I think I should read ([1950] 2 All E.R. 380):

"The next reported case on the application of the rule is Winter v. Winter (5). In that case the husband asked for a re-hearing of the wife's petition on the ground that the decree which she had obtained by reason of his alleged desertion was against the justice of the case in that it was untrue that he had ever deserted her, and that he now wished to put the real facts before the court. The wife's petition had been duly served on the husband, who had deliberately decided to do nothing to oppose it and had not entered an appearance, so that the petition was undefended and the wife obtained her decree. The Divisional Court ordered a re-hearing, although, as LANGTON, J., said, the application, so far as the husband personally was concerned, had no vestige of merit. The order for re-hearing was made on the specific ground that in matrimonial matters there was always something more to be considered than the mere individual merits of the parties and it was the duty of the court to consider the interests of the State as well as the private interests in such cases."

What counsel for the husband says is that in a case where a party has not appeared to defend, a re-trial may be granted when the respondent comes to the Divisional Court and says: "Although I had my opportunity before and did not take it, now I want to bring evidence before the court to show that what the petitioner said was untrue," and it is illogical that, where the respondent did attend and where there was evidence, he should not be permitted to obtain a second hearing if he can show that there is important new material which he can lay before the court which would have seriously affected the first decision. I am not persuaded that such a conclusion follows from what was said by LANGTON, J., and approved by this court in Prince v. Prince (4), and I do not think there is a complete parallel between, on the one hand, the case where a petitioner comes and gives evidence which is not contested so that the judge can do nothing but act on that evidence, and, on the other, the case in which both parties attend and give their evidence and are cross-examined and the judge makes up his mind at the hearing which is the truthful witness. I think that to accede to the broad proposition of counsel for the husband would be to make an exception of the most startling character to the general rule which, let it not be forgotten, is itself founded on public policy, namely, the public interest that there should be an end to litigation. I think, if the view for which counsel for the husband contended was accepted, then in every matrimonial case where one party or the other afterwards found that he could present a better case than he had succeeded in doing in the court below, this court might have no option but either to hear the matter over again or grant a re-trial. That, I think, would plainly be quite contrary to public policy and would not be a proper consideration of the interest of the State.

I do not say that there may not be cases of an exceptional character from which it appears quite plainly that the court has been deceived (and, in particular, deceived as regards the discretion statement) and that an exception should not then be made to the rule which would otherwise be applicable. But, in the first place, I have come to the conclusion that this is not such a case, and, in the second place, the existence of the office of the Queen's Proctor must not be forgotten. In the present case, as I understand from counsel for the husband, the Queen's Proctor, who had been informed of the proposed new evidence, expressed the view that, since the husband was proposing to appeal and to serve this notice of motion, he did not himself intend to intervene. I must not be taken to be criticising the decision made by the Queen's Proctor, but the existence of that office seems to me prima facie to cover this sort of case in the interest of the State, and, if there is evidence, albeit evidence that one party or the other could with proper diligence have produced before, and if the Queen's Proctor feels able to show that the decree was obtained on some false evidence, he is there to protect the public interest by his intervention and to see that the process of the court is not abused. Prima facie, therefore, the interest of the State will be protected in that way, and for that reason, though there may be exceptions to the general rule, they will, in my judgment, be rare. I need not, however, pursue this matter further, because I have given, I hope, sufficient reasons already for the conclusion which I reached (after, I confess, some doubt and anxiety because of the force of the argument which counsel for the husband presented to us) that this is not a case in which the fresh evidence should be admitted. I have treated the motion throughout my judgment as being a motion to admit fresh evidence now. I think, however, it was properly conceded by the parties or their counsel that, if the fresh evidence ought to be allowed, in the interests of everybody the best course would have been to direct a new trial so that this evidence could then be given and challenged by cross-examination or otherwise, for it would be very difficult in a case of this kind to deal with the evidence piecemeal—indeed, I think it would be impossible. I conclude, therefore, that this motion ought to be refused and that the husband ought not to be allowed now to produce this new evidence, nor should he be entitled to obtain a new trial based on the existence and availability of that new evidence.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. The motion with which we are dealing is for leave to produce and read certain affidavits in addition to the evidence which was given before COLLINGWOOD, J., and for leave to adduce the oral evidence of those witnesses who have made affidavits at the hearing of this appeal. But counsel for the husband made it plain that, in his view, the ultimate thing to be achieved was a new trial based largely on the new evidence which he hoped to be able to produce.

The principles have been enunciated by my Lord, but they are conveniently set out in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 1252:

"It is an invariable rule in all the courts . . . that if evidence which either was in the possession of parties at the time of a trial, or by proper diligence might have been obtained, is either not produced, or has not been procured, and the case is decided adversely to the side to which the evidence was available, no opportunity for producing that evidence ought to be given by the granting of a new trial."

Those were the words of LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., in Shedden v. Patrick & A.-G. (6) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 545), cited by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Nash v. Rochford Rural Council (7) ([1917] 1 K.B. 393). Then later (ibid.):

"The new evidence is admissible if it would have formed a determining factor in or an important influence on the result . . . A fortiori where it would be conclusive . . . Sed quære if it is admissible if there is only a reasonable probability that, if it were given, a different decision would be reached . . .”

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the contents of the affidavits and continued:] I say no more than that, so far as this motion is concerned, I am content to put reliance on the first ground, namely, that it is not shown here on behalf of the husband that this evidence was not available at the time of the trial or could not by reasonable diligence have been procured.

At an early stage in this case I asked counsel for the husband why the Queen's Proctor had not intervened. Perhaps I may quote the words of LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., when sitting as a divorce judge, when he said in Wilkinson v. Wilkinson & Seymour (8) (126 L.T. 29, n.):

“It is the duty of every petitioner in this court to place the facts of his or her case most fully before the court, and the wholesome and well-established rule that on the intervention of the [Queen's] Proctor a decree may be rescinded, if there is a failure to deal with the court with the utmost good faith, is one that is not to be relaxed.”

Therefore, where part of the case (and I think probably the principal part of the case) sought to be made by counsel for the husband was: “Here a decree has been granted to the wife by the exercise of the discretion vested in the learned judge, and that discretion has been wrongly obtained, not merely by concealment, but by deliberate perjury”, I should have thought that it was pre-eminently a matter for the intervention of the Queen's Proctor. But it would appear from what we were told that the Queen's Proctor had said that he was content to leave it to the husband to proceed with this matter himself.

The submission made by counsel for the husband that the invariable rule, to quote the words of LORD CHELMSFORD about the admission of fresh evidence, did not apply in its strictness to matrimonial causes because the State had a peculiar and particular interest in matrimonial causes, has been fully dealt with by my Lord. The rule itself is based on public policy and I know of no authority which says that in matrimonial causes there is to be some particular and special rule as apart from the rules which normally apply.

I do not doubt that the battle between the husband and wife is going to be about the custody of the child of the marriage. All I desire to say is that there was an argument whether on the custody proceedings before the registrar or before the judge, if it appeared that an attempt was made to introduce in the custody proceedings in order to influence the decision many of the facts contained in these affidavits, the registrar or the judge could say: “I cannot deal with this. I must deal with the matter as it came from COLLINGWOOD, J.” All I would desire to say, without making any pronouncement about so difficult a matter, is that the question of the custody of the child will, of course, be in the complete discretion either of the registrar or of the judge, and he will decide what evidence he will hear and what he thinks relevant to the particular issue which he then has to determine. In all the circumstances of the case I think that this motion for the introduction of fresh evidence on the hearing of this appeal in the hope that it might lead to a new trial as a result of the hearing of the appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. It was suggested during the discussion before us that, unless the proposed new evidence could be introduced in the divorce proceedings, the facts which are adumbrated by the affidavits could not be brought to the attention of the court when it deals with an application regarding the custody of the child of the marriage. Some at least of the evidence contained in these affidavits would, if true, be of some relevance in the custody proceedings, and, in my opinion, it should not be excluded merely because it did not form part of the material on which the issues of divorce were determined. To exclude evidence on a custody application on that ground would result in preventing the court from discharging its paramount duty in matters relating to the care and custody of the children, namely, to ascertain what directions will best serve the interests of the children themselves. In its examination of this matter the court is bound to inquire into all relevant circumstances, and a circumstance, if otherwise material, is not to be regarded as irrelevant merely because it was not introduced into the divorce proceedings. I say nothing as to how the registrar or the judge before whom the custody proceedings come should deal with this evidence or to what extent he should admit it or what steps he should take to ascertain whether it is true. All I am saying is that for my part I take the view that it should not be regarded as matter to be excluded from his consideration altogether merely on the ground that it did not form part of the evidence in the divorce proceedings. I agree with the result which my brethren have indicated.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I also agree with what has been said by my brethren with regard to the admissibility of new evidence in custody proceedings.

Re CAMPBELL COVERINGS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), May 5, 1953.]

Company—Winding-up—Voluntary winding-up—Public examination of officers—Power of court to order—Necessity for “further report”—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 236 (3), s. 270 (1), s. 307 (1), s. 334 (3).

In the voluntary winding-up of a limited company, the liquidator made a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 334 (2), who referred the matter to the Board of Trade. The board, after investigation, applied to the court for, and obtained, an order under s. 334 (3) of the Act of 1948 conferring on the official receiver “all such powers of investigating the affairs of the company” as were provided by the said Act in the case of a winding-up by the court. The official receiver applied under s. 334 (3) for an order directing the public examination of a former director of the company.

HELD: although it was necessary in accordance with s. 270 (1) of the Act of 1948 before any such order could be made in a compulsory winding-up that a further report should be made to the court by the official receiver under s. 236 (2) of that Act, that requirement did not obtain in the case of a voluntary winding-up because the steps involved could arise only in a compulsory winding-up, but, in any event, the language of s. 334 (3), which was apt to enable powers of investigation to be conferred such as were vested in the official receiver in a compulsory winding-up by s. 235, did not contemplate such an order, and, therefore, the application was misconceived.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: If it should be thought appropriate in this case to make an application under s. 307 (1) of the Act of 1948 for the public examination of the former director, it would not be necessary for there to have been a “further report” before the jurisdiction under s. 270 (1) could arise, but similar information to that ordinarily contained in such a report would be required by the court.

- (1) Re Great Kruger Gold Mining Co. Ex p. Barnard, [1892] 3 Ch. 307; 62 L.J.Ch. 22; 67 L.T. 770; 10 Digest 870, 5892.

A EX PARTE MOTION by an assistant official receiver in a voluntary winding-up of a company under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 334 (3), for an order that a former director of the company be publicly examined.

B On Feb. 5, 1953, pursuant to s. 334 (3) of the Act of 1948 all powers of investigation into the affairs of Campbell Coverings, Ltd., as were provided by the said Act in the case of a winding-up by the court were conferred on George Frederick Morris, an assistant official receiver attached to the High Court of Justice, and it was ordered that the said official receiver or the liquidator or any creditor or contributory of the company be at liberty to apply to the court in these proceedings to determine any matter arising in the voluntary winding-up of the company. The assistant official receiver took out a summons in these proceedings for an order

C “that his report made to the court pursuant to s. 236 (2) of the Act of 1948, and dated Mar. 18, 1953, be considered and such order made thereon as the court may deem just.”

D On Mar. 30, 1953, the summons came before ROXBURGH, J., and on behalf of the official receiver an order for the public examination of a former director of the company was sought. ROXBURGH, J., refused the application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to make such an order in the voluntary winding-up of a company. The assistant official receiver now applied to the Court of Appeal ex parte for a similar order.

Denys B. Buckley for the official receiver.

E SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an application which comes before the court under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 10, which reads:

“Where an ex parte application has been refused by the court below, an application for a similar purpose may be made to the Court of Appeal ex parte . . .”,

F within the time therein stated. The matter concerns a company known as Campbell Coverings, Ltd., which is now in voluntary liquidation, the winding-up resolution having been passed in June, 1950. The affairs of the company have caused some concern to those who are involved in the liquidation, and in July, 1952, the liquidator made a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions in accordance with the Companies Act, 1948, s. 334 (2), which provides:

G “If it appears to the liquidator in the course of a voluntary winding-up that any past or present officer, or any member, of the company has been guilty of any offence in relation to the company for which he is criminally liable, he shall forthwith report the matter, in the case of a winding-up in England, to the Director of Public Prosecutions . . . and shall furnish to the director . . . such information and give to him such access to and facilities for inspecting and taking copies of any documents, being information or documents in the possession or under the control of the liquidator

H and relating to the matter in question, as [he] may require.”

Following on that report, an order was made on Feb. 5, 1953, on the application of the Board of Trade under s. 334 (3). The substantive part of the order is:

“It is ordered that pursuant to s. 334 (3) of the [Companies Act, 1948] all such powers of investigating the affairs of the said company as are provided by the said Act in the case of a winding-up by the court be conferred upon George Frederick Morris of Board of Trade, Companies (Winding-up)

Department, Inveresk House, Aldwych, in the county of London, an assistant official receiver attached to the High Court of Justice, And it is ordered that the applicant or the liquidator or any creditor or contributory of the said company be at liberty to apply to the court in these proceedings to determine any matter arising in the voluntary winding-up of the said company as there may be occasion."

That form of order followed in its language s. 334 (3), which is referred to therein, A and which is in these terms:

"Where any report is made under [s. 334 (2)] to the Director of Public Prosecutions . . . he may, if he thinks fit, refer the matter to the Board of Trade for further inquiry, and the board shall thereupon investigate the matter and may if they think it expedient, apply to the court for an order conferring on the board or any person designated by the board for the purpose with respect to the company concerned all such powers of investigating the affairs of the company as are provided by this Act in the case of a winding-up by the court."

The matter which has given rise to the order and to the present application is this. According to the investigations so far made it is said that one of the former directors of the company has been guilty of malpractices in relation to the company's affairs, and what is now particularly desired is that that individual should be directed to attend the court for a public examination. Although, therefore, the order made on Feb. 5, 1953, in terms followed the language of s. 334 (3), counsel for the assistant official receiver seeks now a further order under the same subsection having the effect that the director referred to should be required to attend for a public examination. The form of the application for that purpose is not entirely happy in its language, for it asks for an order that the report which the assistant official receiver made to the court pursuant to s. 236 (2) of the Act, and dated Mar. 18, 1953, "be considered and such order made thereon as the court may deem just". In fact the assistant official receiver made no report pursuant to s. 236 (2). Indeed, it has been the main point of the argument which counsel has presented to us that no report under that sub-section is required or could be made. ROXBURGH, J., thought that such a report was required and was, indeed, a condition precedent to the making of any order for a public examination. Delivering his judgment in open court, ROXBURGH, J., said, in effect, that orders directing the public examination of an officer or ex-officer of a company, although made in a voluntary winding-up, require as a condition precedent to the court's jurisdiction the existence of what is called a "further" report in s. 236 (2) and (3), that further report in turn requiring the existence of a preliminary report under s. 236 (1). The main contention of counsel for the assistant official receiver has been that so to hold makes nonsense of s. 334 (3), for the reason that since, in a voluntary winding-up, neither the preliminary report nor any further report such as is mentioned in s. 236 could have come into existence, s. 334 (3) becomes, on the judge's view, a dead letter. With all respect to the learned judge, I agree with counsel that the requirement of a further report as specified in s. 236 (2) ought not to be regarded as a condition precedent to an order under s. 334 (3). The legislature is saying that certain powers may be exercised in a voluntary winding-up, those powers being powers which in a compulsory winding-up are exercisable only if certain things have been done which only can be done in a compulsory winding-up.

I must now refer, though briefly, to the earlier sections of the Act of 1948. Section 235 deals with a winding-up by the court, and provides for a statement of the company's affairs to be submitted to the official receiver. Thus, s. 235 (1) provides that, unless the court dispenses therewith, there is to be made out "a statement as to the affairs of the company . . . verified by affidavit, and showing" particulars of the company's assets, debts, liabilities, etc., and also giving "such further or other information as may be prescribed or as the official receiver may require." Section 235 (2) states who are to submit and verify the statement, and s. 235 (3) specifies the time within which it must be submitted. Section 235 (4) states that:

A "Any person making or concurring in making the statement and affidavit required by this section shall be allowed . . . out of the assets of the company . . ."

B his costs and expenses incurred in the matter. Section 235 (5) provides that if any person, without reasonable excuse, makes default in complying with the requirements of the section, he is liable to a fine, and s. 235 (6) says that a person who states in writing that he is a creditor or contributory shall be entitled as therein provided to inspect the statement. Section 235 (7) provides:

"Any person untruthfully so stating himself to be a creditor or contributory shall be guilty of a contempt of court and shall, on the application of the liquidator or of the official receiver, be punishable accordingly."

C It will be seen, therefore, that all these powers for getting information depend on there being a winding-up by the court. Section 236 (1) provides that, where there has been such a statement (and similarly in cases where the statement has been dispensed with), the official receiver is to make a preliminary report to the court in which he is to state, among other things, whether he thinks further inquiry is desirable in regard to the promotion, formation, etc., of the company: see s. 236 (1) (c). The language of s. 236 (2) is:

D "The official receiver may also, if he thinks fit, make a further report, or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in its promotion or formation or by an officer of the company in relation to the company since the formation thereof . . ."

E In that event, i.e., when a further report is made, the court shall have the further powers provided (inter alia) by s. 270 of the Act, which section empowers the court to order public examination: see s. 236 (3).

F Before I come to s. 270, however, I should mention that s. 245 gives a liquidator in a compulsory winding-up certain administrative powers. Section 266 empowers the court to order production of books for inspection by creditors or contributories, and s. 268 makes provision for the private examination of any person suspected of having in his possession any property of the company, and so forth. In a private examination, it may be observed, persons required to be examined may object to answer questions on the ground that they may thereby be incriminated and the answers are not available for use in a criminal proceeding. So I come to s. 270, which was foreshadowed in s. 236 (3). Section 270 (1) provides:

G "Where an order has been made in England for winding-up a company by the court, and the official receiver has made a further report under this Act stating that in his opinion a fraud has been committed . . . the court may, after consideration of the report, direct that that person or officer shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose and be publicly examined . . ."

H Section 270 (2) states that the official receiver shall take part in the examination, and s. 270 (3) entitles the liquidator, where the official receiver is not the liquidator, and any creditor or contributory also to take part in the public examination. It has been decided by this court, e.g., in Re Great Kruger Gold Mining Co. Ex p. Barnard (1), that in a compulsory winding-up, in accordance with the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 8 (3), which was then in force and which for present purposes may be taken as being in the same terms as s. 270 (1), before the court can order a public examination there must have been what is called a further report and that report must have been considered. So the suggestion appealed to ROXBURGH, J., that the power of the court to order a public examination must always be regarded as a power limited by the condition that there must be a further report before the court which the court has had to consider. He thought also that emphasis was to be attached to the word "further" so that in turn was involved the conception that there must also have been, first, a preliminary report. As I have already indicated, it seems to me that if Parliament in terms states that powers vested in the court in a compulsory winding-up shall be available also (on application) in a voluntary winding-up, it cannot have been supposed that steps would have been taken in a voluntary winding-up which only arise and which can only be taken in a compulsory winding-up. In other words, if the matter rested on this point alone, I should not myself, with all respect to the judge, regard the language of s. 270 (1), even in the light of the decision in the Great Kruger Gold Mining Co. case (1), as involving the result that you must somehow or other import into s. 334 provisions only applicable in a compulsory winding-up before effect can be given to the section.

During the course of the argument, however, another point was put by ROMER, L.J., which seems to me to be fatal to the application under s. 334 (3). The assistant official receiver understandably wants an order for public examination. Expressing it more accurately, the order required is a direction by the court that the individual in question shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for the purpose of there being publicly examined. Is an order of that kind contemplated by the language of s. 334 (3)? I am compelled to the conclusion that the language does not contemplate such an order. I shall, I hope, be excused if I read the relevant words again because it seems to me that once they are read the answer is self-evident. Sub-section (3) provides that the Board of Trade may apply to the court, not for an order on a person to attend the court for examination, but for an order conferring on the board, or some person designated by the board,

" . . . all such powers of investigating the affairs of the company as are provided by this Act in the case of a winding-up by the court."

It seems to me impossible to suggest that under that sub-section the court could invest the official receiver with the power on his own motion to conduct a public examination of the person whose conduct had been impugned. It appeared at first that unless by some stretch of the language some such construction was given to the sub-section, no effect could be given to it at all, but I think the answer to that suggestion is found in the language of s. 235 to which I have already alluded at some length. In other words, it seems to me that s. 334 (3) is apt to give the official receiver powers to compel persons (under penalties if they do not obey) to supply information, etc.—powers which, in a compulsory winding-up, the official receiver would have under s. 235—but I have been unable to construe s. 334 (3) as enabling the court, on the application of the Board of Trade, to set in motion the procedure for either a private or a public examination. Whether Parliament intended sub-s. (3) to produce that effect, I do not know—I can judge only from the language used, and the language used seems to me necessarily to provide a negative answer to the question. I do not think that that conclusion is, from the point of view of those concerned in this liquidation, a counsel entirely of despair. I have passed over, in my references, s. 307 (1), which provides:

"The liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the court . . . to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound-up by the court."

An application under that section must be by the liquidator or a contributory or a creditor, and the present applicant is the official receiver. If, therefore, it is thought appropriate to set in motion the powers of that section, another applicant will have to be found to make the application. That application is not now before the court, and, therefore, it would not be right for me to express a final view on any problem which might arise if it were. But the view which I have taken, with all respect to ROXBURGH, J., on the question, must there be a "further" report in a voluntary winding-up no less than in a compulsory winding-up, applies in the case of s. 307 as in the case of s. 334. I cannot suppose that when Parliament says that the court may, on application, exercise any of the powers in a voluntary winding-up which it may exercise in a compulsory winding-up, it was saying at the same time that, if the powers in a compulsory winding-up require the existence of conditions which could be only satisfied in a compulsory winding-up, then those powers could not in any event be available in a voluntary winding-up. Such a conclusion seems to me to be in conflict with the express purpose and sense of s. 307 (1). I am aware that in so stating I am expressing a view which is not in accordance with the note which the learned editors have made in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 12th ed., p. 568, and I am, therefore, all the more diffident in expressing a final conclusion on the matter. Let me say also, however, that it would not follow that the court would necessarily exercise the power here in question unless at any rate there were before the court material which was in substance equivalent to the material which the court would require in a compulsory winding-up. Indeed, the contrary seems to me the right view. The court would require before, in its discretion, it exercised its power similar information to that which it would have to have if the application were one in a compulsory winding-up, but, for reasons which I have already indicated, I say no more about what might happen if an application was made under s. 307. It is possible that other points may arise which have not been discussed before us today. On this application it seems to me that the point I have mentioned is fatal. I only add that the form of the order of February, 1953, and also the form of the present application itself, seem to indicate the fallacy in the proposition that, under s. 334 (3), the court can make an order directed to a particular individual requiring him to attend the court on a day and time stated for the purpose of there being publicly examined. For these reasons it seems to me that the present application must be refused.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree, and I would only like to say that I am glad that the Master of the Rolls at present thinks that s. 307 may suit the purpose. I should be sorry to think that in a voluntary liquidation after the inquiries which have been made into this matter the court could not order a public examination of the individual concerned. It seems to me that if on the application of the liquidator the court can make such an order it would be most satisfactory. I agree with what my Lord has said.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree.

Application refused.

R. v. MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

Ex parte CORPORATION OF LONDON.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Parker, JJ.), April 28, 29, 1953.]

Town and Country Planning—Purchase notice—"Owner" of land—Person entitled to receive rackrent—Grant by freeholders of long lease—Confirmation of purchase notice—Duty of Minister—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 19 (1) (2), s. 119 (1).

In 1873 premises were leased for eighty years at a rent of £350 per annum. In 1922 an underlease of the premises was granted at £1,136 per annum. In 1925 trustees, who were the reversioners of the freehold of the premises, leased them for seventy-five years at a rent of £750 per annum, subject to, but with the benefit of, the lease of 1873. In 1940 the underlease of 1922 was transferred to H. & Sons, Ltd., and they were also granted a land certificate in respect of the lease of 1925, but subject to the lease of 1873. In 1942 H. & Sons, Ltd. acquired the residue of the lease of 1873. During the war the premises were destroyed by bombing. In 1950 H. & Sons, Ltd., gave notice to the Corporation of London, as the planning authority, asking for permission to develop the site, and, on permission being refused, they served a purchase notice on the corporation under s. 19 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, requiring the corporation to purchase their leasehold interest in the site. The Minister confirmed this notice, and the leasehold interest of H. & Sons, Ltd. was assigned to the corporation. In 1952 the trustees applied to the corporation for permission to develop the site, and, on permission being refused, they appealed to the Minister under s. 16 (1) of the Act. The Minister disallowed the appeal, and the trustees then served a purchase notice on the corporation under s. 19 (1) of the Act, requiring the corporation to purchase the fee simple in the site. On Dec. 31, 1952, the Minister confirmed this notice.

HELD: (i) the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) of the Act made it clear who was the owner of land for the purposes of applying the provisions of s. 19 (1) of the Act, and the meaning to be applied to "owner" in s. 19 (1) was the same as that placed on the word in s. 119 (1).

(ii) in view of the rent payable under the underlease of 1922 the lease of 1925 was not a letting at a rackrent, and, therefore, under the lease of 1925, the trustees were not entitled to receive a rackrent; further, since they had parted with possession of the property till 1999, they had no power to let or to collect rent, and, accordingly, even if the premises were let at a rackrent, they would not be entitled to that rent; and, therefore, they were not "owners" as defined in s. 119 (1) of the Act, and were not entitled to serve a purchase notice under s. 19 (1).

(iii) if the jurisdiction of the Minister to make an order confirming a purchase notice under s. 19 (1) of the Act was challenged, he ought to satisfy himself that he had that jurisdiction; as the notice served by the trustees was a nullity, he had no jurisdiction to confirm it; and his order of Dec. 31, 1952, must be quashed.

MOTIONS for orders of certiorari and mandamus.

On Sept. 29, 1873, the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, as owners of No. 69, Ludgate Hill, in the city of London, leased the premises to T. Treloar for eighty years at a ground rent of £350 per annum. Later, the commissioners transferred their reversion of the freehold of the premises to one Alexander Jones. On May 23, 1922, the representatives of T. Treloar granted an underlease of the premises to S. T. Williamson and E. B. Williamson for the remainder of the term of eighty years less seven days at a rent of £1,136 per annum, which was approximately the rackrent which would be obtainable at that date. On Oct. 2, 1924, S. T. Williamson and E. B. Williamson assigned their underlease to E. B. Williamson and C. M. Walker. On June 23, 1925, the trustees of Alexander Jones granted a lease of seventy-five years to E. B. Williamson and C. M. Walker at a rent of £750 per annum, subject to, but with the benefit of, the original lease of Sept. 29, 1873. On Feb. 19, 1940, the underlease of May 23, 1922, was transferred to Hampton & Sons, Ltd.; on Mar. 11, 1940, they were granted a land certificate in respect of the lease of June 23, 1925, subject to the original lease of Sept. 29, 1873; and on Apr. 8, 1942, they acquired the residue of the term of the original lease of Sept. 23, 1873. In the early part of 1940 the premises were damaged by enemy action, and in May, 1941, they were completely destroyed and the site was left derelict. On Feb. 9, 1950, Hampton & Sons, Ltd., gave notice to the Corporation of London, as the planning authority, asking for permission to develop the site, but permission was refused on the ground that the land was required for other forms of development. On Aug. 17, 1950, Hampton & Sons, Ltd., served a purchase notice on the corporation under s. 19 (1) of the Act requiring the corporation to purchase their leasehold interest in the site, and the corporation, in accordance with s. 19 (2), sent the notice to the Minister. The corporation took the view that Hampton & Sons, Ltd. were the owners of the site within the Act and that the Minister was bound to confirm the notice because of the existing state of the site, and so they did not oppose the application to the Minister to confirm the notice, which he did on Nov. 9, 1950. The sum agreed to be payable to Hampton & Sons, Ltd. for their leasehold interest was £71,250. That sum was paid to them by the corporation in due course, their leasehold interest was assigned to the corporation, and the title of the corporation to the leasehold interest was registered at the Land Registry.

On Mar. 24, 1952, the trustees of Alexander Jones applied to the corporation for permission to develop the site. The corporation informed them that planning permission for development had already been refused, but they appealed to the Minister under s. 16 (1) of the Act, and, on Aug. 22, 1952, the Minister disallowed the appeal. On Sept. 1, 1952, the trustees served a purchase notice on the corporation requiring the corporation to purchase the fee simple in the site. The corporation sent the notice to the Minister under s. 19 (2), and, in opposition to the application to the Minister to confirm the notice, contended that the trustees, being freeholders of the site in respect of which there was a leasehold interest which was vested in the corporation, were not "owners" under s. 119 (1) of the Act who could serve a purchase notice under s. 19 (1). The trustees contended that the Minister was not concerned with the question of ownership, and that his duties were confined to considering whether the conditions specified in s. 19 (1) (a) and (b) were fulfilled in relation to the land which was the subject of the notice. They submitted, first, that the context was such that the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) was not applicable, and, secondly, that, if it was, the rent receivable by the trustees was a rackrent.

On Dec. 31, 1952, the Minister confirmed the notice and stated that he accepted the view put forward by the trustees and that his confirmation did not import any decision whether the servers of the purchase notice were owners entitled to serve such a notice or not. The corporation applied for an order of certiorari to quash the Minister's decision of Dec. 31, 1952, and that an order of mandamus should issue to the Minister requiring him to hear and determine the issue of the confirmation or otherwise of the purchase notice of Sept. 1, 1952.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I will ask LYNSKEY, J., to give the first judgment.

LYNSKEY, J.: This is a motion by the Corporation of London for an order of certiorari for the removal into this court

"of a decision dated Dec. 31, 1952, made by the Minister of Housing and Local Government pursuant to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, confirming or purporting to confirm a purchase notice served or purported to be served under s. 19 of the said Act in respect of the fee simple of land being the site of No. 69, Ludgate Hill, in the city of London", the notice being given by or on behalf of Sir William Robert Dermot Joshua Cusack-Smith, Baronet, and Elizabeth Dora Allworth, widow, the trustees of the real estate of Alexander Jones, deceased. The Minister's order was made under s. 19 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which provides:

"Where permission to develop any land is refused, whether by the local planning authority or by the Minister, on an application in that behalf made under this Part of this Act, or is granted by that authority or by the Minister subject to conditions, then if any owner of the land claims—(a) that the land has become incapable of reasonably beneficial use in its existing state; and (b) in a case where permission to develop the land was granted as aforesaid subject to conditions, that the land cannot be rendered capable of reasonably beneficial use by the carrying out of the permitted development in accordance with those conditions; (c) in any case, that the land cannot be rendered capable of reasonably beneficial use by the carrying out of any other development for which permission has been or is deemed to be granted under this Part of this Act, or for which the local planning authority or the Minister have undertaken to grant such permission, he may, within the time and in the manner prescribed by regulations made under this Act, serve on the council of the county borough or county district in which the land is situated a notice (hereinafter referred to as a 'purchase notice') requiring that council to purchase his interest in the land in accordance with the provisions of this section."

By sub-s. (2):

"Where a purchase notice is served on any council under this section, that council shall forthwith transmit a copy of the notice to the Minister, and subject to the following provisions of this section the Minister shall, if he is satisfied that the conditions specified in paras. (a) to (c) of the foregoing sub-section are fulfilled, confirm the notice, and thereupon the council shall be deemed to be authorised to acquire the interest of the owner compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of Part IV of this Act, and to have served a notice to treat in respect thereof on such date as the Minister may direct . . ."

By sub-s. (3):

"If within the period of six months from the date on which a purchase notice is served under this section the Minister has neither confirmed the notice nor taken any such other action as is mentioned in para. (a) or para. (b) of the last foregoing sub-section, nor notified the owner by whom the notice was served that he does not propose to confirm the notice, the notice shall be deemed to be confirmed at the expiration of that period, and the council on whom the notice was served shall be deemed to be authorised to acquire the interest of the owner compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of Part IV of this Act, and to have served notice to treat in respect thereof at the expiration of the said period."

By s. 119 (1) the definition of "owner", "except so far as the contrary is provided or the context otherwise requires", is:

" 'owner', in relation to any land, means, except in Part VI of this Act, a person, other than a mortgagee not in possession, who, whether in his own right or as trustee or agent for any other person, is entitled to receive the rackrent of the land or, where the land is not let at a rackrent, would be so entitled if it were so let, and, in Part VI of this Act, has the meaning assigned to it by s. 64 of this Act."

B

Those were the sections under which the Minister purported to act in confirming the notice, and the point taken by the corporation in their motion is that the Minister had no jurisdiction to make his order confirming the notice because the person or persons who had given the notice which he purported to confirm were not owners of the land as defined in the Act and not owners within the meaning of s. 19 (1)—in other words, the trustees of the late Alexander Jones were not persons entitled to give that notice. The result is that the notice given by them was a nullity, and the Minister was, therefore, without jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

C

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It was contended on behalf of the trustees that the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) was not to be applied to the word "owner" when used in s. 19 (1). It was said that the context of s. 19 (1) otherwise required, and, in particular, that the use of the word "any" before the word "owner"—"if any owner of the land claims"—indicated that the context required a different interpretation of the word "owner" from that given in s. 119 (1). I do not think that one can say that the context of s. 19 (1) does require any different interpretation of the word "owner" from that which is given in s. 119 (1). In fact, when one looks at the later provisions of the Act (s. 26 and s. 27), it seems fairly clear that the Act is distinguishing between an owner and other persons having other interests, and the effect of s. 119 (1) is to make it clear who is the owner of the land for the purposes of applying the provisions of s. 19, apart from other sections of the Act.

E

F The question then arises whether the trustees can be described as being "owners" having regard to the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1). The first point to consider is: Was this land at the time let at a rackrent? Two possibilities have been envisaged. First, it is suggested that the lease of 1925 was a letting at a rackrent, and, as the premises are still let under that lease, the trustees are persons entitled under the terms of that lease to receive the rackrent. When, however, one looks at the position in 1922 when these premises were let at £1,136 per annum to an occupying tenant, it is impossible to say that a rental in 1925 of £750 a year was anything more than a type of ground rent, and, in fact, although the argument was suggested by counsel for the trustees, I do not think it was stressed with any great vigour. On the other hand, it is said that the trustees would be entitled to the rackrent if the premises were so let—that at present these are derelict premises, and, but for the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Act, 1939, the trustees would be entitled to £750 per annum, and, this being a derelict site, that would be a rackrent. That pre-supposes the fact that they are in a position to let and to receive rent if let. Their position today is that they are not entitled either to enter on the land themselves or to allow anybody else to do so. They have parted with their possession of the land until 1999. They have no power to let. They have no power to collect rent in respect of the premises and, therefore, it cannot be said that they are persons who, if the land is let at a rackrent, would be so entitled. The persons so entitled if the premises were let at a rackrent would be the Corporation of London as the persons entitled to occupy under the lease of 1925 which had been assigned to them.

The result is that it is clear that the trustees are not "owners" as defined in s. 119 (1) of the Act, and, therefore, were not persons who were entitled to serve the purchase notice under s. 19 (1). Therefore, that notice was a nullity, the Minister had no jurisdiction to make an order confirming it, and his order doing so must be brought up and quashed.

It is submitted on behalf of the corporation as one of their grounds for asking this court to quash the confirmation that the Minister refused to inquire whether the persons serving the notice were owners or not. It seems to me that if the jurisdiction of the Minister to make the order is challenged, as it was challenged in this case, it falls on him to satisfy himself that he has jurisdiction to deal with the matter, and to that extent he must make the necessary inquiries to satisfy himself that he has power to exercise the jurisdiction which he is actually exercising at the time. Whether he ought to inquire in every case is another matter, and I do not propose to lay down any general rule about this but only to deal with the facts I have before me. All I say is that, if the jurisdiction of the Minister is challenged as to his right to make the order, he ought to satisfy himself that he has that jurisdiction. If he does satisfy himself that he has, of course, he can exercise it. If he is satisfied that he has not, he can refuse to exercise it. It may leave the person who has received the refusal in a difficult position, but that is not a matter with which we are directly concerned.

HAVANT AND WATERLOO URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. PAYNE (VALUATION OFFICER) AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Jenkins, L.J.J., and Vaisey, J.), April 24, 1953.]

Rates—Assessment—Deduction from gross value—Rate, charge, or assessment made by commissioners of sewers “or other like authority”—Sea defence rate levied by urban district council—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), s. 22 (1) (a).

Acting under the authority of a private Act an urban district council constructed a wall for the defence of part of the district against the sea and to defray the cost levied a sea defence rate on the owners of properties in the area benefited, as defined in the Act.

HELD: the council were not commissioners of sewers “or other like authority” making a “rate, charge, or assessment . . . in respect of” a wall for the benefit of the hereditaments affected within the meaning of s. 22 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and, therefore, the average annual amount of the sea defence rate did not fall to be deducted from the gross value of any hereditament subject thereto under the private Act.

FOR THE RATING AND VALUATION ACT, 1925, s. 22 (1) (a), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 20, p. 127.

CASE STATED by the Lands Tribunal.

The ratepayer was the owner and occupier of a shop known as “Eastwards”, Creek Road, Hayling Island. On Jan. 14, 1952, the valuation officer made a proposal to increase the assessment of the shop from £42 gross value and £32 rateable value to £75 gross value and £60 rateable value. The ratepayer objected, and on the hearing of the valuation officer's appeal against the objection contended, inter alia, that the average annual amount of a sea defence rate which was payable to the Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council in respect of the hereditament under a private Act, the Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council Act, 1947, ought to be deducted from the gross value in addition to the ordinary percentage deduction, as being a “rate, charge, or assessment made by any commissioners of sewers or other like authority” in respect of a wall “for the benefit of the hereditament” within the meaning of s. 22 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. The local valuation court upheld the ratepayer's contention and determined the assessment at £75 gross value and £51 rateable value, the £9 deduction being the average annual amount of the sea defence rate. On appeal by the Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council, the rating authority, the Lands Tribunal affirmed this decision. The council appealed, contending that the sea defence rate was not deductible because it was in respect of a capital sum and because the council were not “any commissioners of sewers or other like authority” within the meaning of the sub-section.

DENNING, L.J.: Hayling Island is a popular seaside resort which was at one time liable to flooding by the sea. In December, 1945, the defences were breached by the sea, and much property on the island was flooded. Thereupon the local council, Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council, obtained permission to start building a sea wall. They borrowed money for the purpose from the Public Works Loan Board, and the position was put on a statutory footing by the Havant and Waterloo Urban District Council Act, 1947. By that Act the council were empowered to make a wall for defence against the sea, and were also empowered to charge the cost against the owners of the properties which were benefited by it. The particular part of Hayling Island which was benefited by the wall was marked out by the Act, and it was enacted that the owners of the benefited part should pay to the council the cost of construction. They were to pay it by means of a sea defence rate, and there was a provision that, if an owner of land wanted to redeem the amount of the rate, he could redeem it by paying a capital sum to the council. That was in 1947. The sea wall was completed, and the sea defence rate became payable.

The question which we have to determine is what is the effect of the sea defence rate on the general rate leviable in the district. We have a test case before us. A shop in Hayling Island known as "Eastwards", Creek Road, Hayling Island, is assessed at £75 gross value. If the ordinary percentage specified in the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, is deducted, the rateable value of the shop will be £60, but the ratepayer has to pay a sea defence rate of £9, and he contends that he is entitled to deduct that £9 from the £60, making a rateable value of only £51. The council say that he is not entitled to deduct the £9. In this district the general rate is 23s. in the £, and it is very greatly to the benefit of the ratepayer to get the amount reduced to £51. If he succeeds in his contention it will mean that, by paying a sea defence rate of £9, he will pay £10 7s. less on his general rate. Thus, on an ordinary rateable value of £60, he would have to pay £69, but on £51 he would only have to pay £58 13s. Even adding on the £9, that only makes £67 13s. in all, so that he is £1 7s. in hand compared with other ratepayers. In short, he pays nothing for the sea wall, but gets a bonus of £1 7s. at the expense of the other ratepayers. I need hardly say that that would appear to be contrary to the intention of Parliament when it passed the Act of 1947, for it was quite clear that Parliament intended that the owners of these benefited properties should pay for the sea wall.

The question depends on s. 22 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, which provides that in the case of certain hereditaments, of which this is one,

" . . . there shall be deducted from the gross value of the hereditament an amount representing the deduction specified with respect to hereditaments of that class in the second column of the [table contained in Part I of sched. II to the Act] and also, in the case of a hereditament subject to any rate, charge, or assessment made by any commissioners of sewers or other like authority in respect of any drainage, wall, embankment, or other work for the benefit of the hereditament (not being a usual tenant's rate), such further amount as represents the average annual amount of that rate, charge or assessment . . ."

It is said on behalf of the ratepayer that the sea defence rate of £9 is a rate made by "commissioners of sewers or other like authority in respect of" a wall "for the benefit of the hereditament" and, therefore, it is to be deducted. On the other hand, counsel for the local council has urged that, in ascertaining rateable value, the underlying principle is that the ratepayer can deduct maintenance charges, but not charges which are solely for capital improvement, and that this was a charge of a capital nature. He gives as an instance the case of a road taken over by the local authority. The cost of making up the road has to be borne by the owners of adjoining property, but they are not allowed to deduct it from their assessments. So here, he says, the owners of the benefited property should not be allowed to deduct what is really a capital charge.

I prefer to express no opinion on that point. I am content to decide this case on the narrow point that the council are not "commissioners of sewers or other like authority" within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 22 (1) (a). The words in the Act are not "or other authority", but "or other like authority". In my judgment, those words do not include the local authority themselves. They refer to ad hoc authorities, i.e., authorities which are entrusted by Parliament with a specific task such as draining a district or controlling a catchment area. An ad hoc authority often has to expend capital moneys, but it also has to maintain works for the benefit of its district, and the rate which it levies is much more for maintenance charges and interest charges than for capital repayment. It is quite understandable that such a rate should be deducted in order to ascertain rateable value. But this sea defence rate is not a rate of that kind. This urban district council is not an ad hoc authority at all. It is merely the local authority carrying on many activities in its district.

In my opinion, therefore, the sea defence rate cannot be deducted because it is not made by "commissioners of sewers or other like authority". That is a sufficient ground for determining this appeal. Any other view would mean that the charge which Parliament clearly intended in the Act of 1947 should fall on the owners of these particular houses would, in effect, be transferred from the owners of those houses to the rest of the ratepayers of the local district and of the whole county. The outside ratepayers would be subsidising the owners of the benefited houses whereas Parliament clearly contemplated that the owners of the houses should pay for the wall themselves. There is one final point. If there is any conflict between the private Act and the public Act, the private Act should prevail. I am quite satisfied that the intention of Parliament in the private Act was that the sea defence rate should be paid by the owners, and that it should not be deducted in ascertaining the rateable value. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree that this appeal should be allowed. The short point is whether the sea defence rate is a "rate, charge, or assessment made by any commissioners of sewers or other like authority in respect of any drainage, wall, embankment, or other work for the benefit of the hereditament" within the meaning of s. 22 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. The same Act in s. 68 (1) defines the expression "rate", and provides (by para. (a)) that the definition is not to include "any rate which is assessed under any commission of sewers or in respect of any drainage, wall, embankment, or other work for the benefit of the land."

That formula would extend to any rate assessed in respect of any of the matters referred to, not only by any commissioners of sewers, but also by any other body whatsoever having the necessary lawful authority to make the rate. The language of s. 22 (1) (a) shows a significant difference, for there the deduction is allowed, not simply in respect of "any rate, charge, or assessment . . . in respect of any drainage, wall, embankment or other work", but only in respect of rates, charges or assessments of the descriptions mentioned which are made by "any commissioners of sewers or other like authority". Those words in the sub-section limit the rates, charges, and assessments which are deductible, not merely by reference to the matters in respect of which they are made, but also by reference to the character of the authority by which they are made.

The question, then, in the end resolves itself into whether the urban district council in this case is an "other like authority" within the meaning of s. 22 (1) (a). In my view, the expression "other like authority" should not be construed as meaning any other body authorised to perform like statutory functions.

In its primary significance, I do not think the language is apt to convey that meaning. Moreover, if that was the meaning of the words "other like authority", the whole of the reference to "any commissioners of sewers or other like authority" would, in effect, be otiose, for it would extend to any and every kind of body or authority which has the necessary legal power to make rates, charges, or assessments of the descriptions mentioned. I think the words "other like authority" mean a similar body authorised to make rates, charges, or assessments of those descriptions. The body making the rate, charge, or assessment must be an authority comparable in character to commissioners of sewers. In my view, it is impossible to say that the urban district council here complies with that requirement.

I should add that, as pointed out by counsel for the local council in reply, the words "commissioners of sewers or other like authority" would be a most remarkable expression to use if it was intended to include in that expression the local authority itself within whose area the hereditament to be valued is situate. Accordingly, in the view that I take, the sea defence rate in this case is not a rate, charge, or assessment which is deductible under the provision of s. 22 (1) (a), and on that ground, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

VAISEY, J.: I have come to the same conclusion on the grounds already stated by my Lords. I am myself quite satisfied that the result accords with the plain sense and reason of the matter, and I agree that this appeal should succeed.

Appeal allowed.

WURZAL v. DOWKER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Parker, JJ.), April 29, 30, May 11, 1953.]

Street Traffic—Express carriage—Special occasion—Conveyance of members of club on fishing trips on seven consecutive Sundays—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 61 (2)—Road Traffic Act, 1934 (c. 50), s. 25 (1).

The respondent was charged under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 72 (1), with unlawfully permitting a motor coach to be used as an express carriage without a road service licence from the licensing authority. On seven successive Sundays the respondent hired a motor coach, which was not being used under such a licence, to a working men's club to take members of the club on fishing trips.

HELD: to be a "special occasion" within the proviso to s. 61 (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the occasion must be special in the locality to which the journey was made or to the public thereof, and it was not enough that the journey was a special occasion from the point of view of the members of the party; the conditions laid down for a special occasion in s. 25 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, which were not definitive of what was a special occasion, but were merely additional conditions to what, apart from them, would amount to a special occasion, were not inconsistent with this construction of the proviso; and, therefore, the respondent was guilty of the offences charged.

Per curiam: On any view of the meaning of "special occasion" the frequency of the journeys would probably result in the occasions in question not being held to be "special".

CASE STATED by Sheffield justices.

B

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sheffield the appellant, Ernest Wurzal, on behalf of the licensing authority for public service vehicles for the Yorkshire traffic area, preferred seven informations against the respondent, Jethro Dowker, charging that on Sunday, Aug. 17, 1952, and on the six following Sundays, he did unlawfully permit a vehicle (registration number KOG 447 and on one occasion KPJ 249) to be used as an express carriage within the meaning of the Road Traffic Acts, 1930 to 1937, in Kelvin road and other roads in the city of Sheffield otherwise than under a road service licence granted by the licensing authority, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 72.

C

It was proved or admitted that the respondent was the proprietor of a business known as Ideal Coaches and was the registered owner of two motor coaches numbered KOG 447 and KPJ 249. On the first six material dates the motor coach KOG 447 and on the seventh date the motor coach KPJ 249 were hired from the respondent by a member of the committee of the Philadelphian Working Men's Club to take members of the club on fishing trips to Boston, the Boston area, and Tattershall. The respondent had no licence to use the vehicles as express carriages on the material dates. It was agreed that all the conditions specified in the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 25 (1) (which deals with the conditions which must be fulfilled before a vehicle can be exempted from obtaining a licence when used on a "special occasion"), had been satisfied, and that the only issue to be tried was whether these occasions were "special occasions" within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 61 (2). The justices dismissed the informations and the appellant appealed.

F

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. The following judgments were read.

PARKER, J.: This is an appeal by way of Case stated by justices for the city of Sheffield who dismissed seven informations preferred by the appellant on behalf of the licensing authority for public service vehicles for the Yorkshire traffic area against the respondent for that he on certain days permitted the use of two vehicles in contravention of s. 72 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, in that on each occasion he did unlawfully permit the vehicle to be used as an express carriage.

G

The facts found by the justices were that the respondent was the proprietor of a business known as Ideal Coaches and the registered owner of the two motor coaches in question; that on each of six Sundays in August and September, 1952, the respondent hired one or other of the motor coaches to a committee member of the Philadelphian Working Men's Club to take members of the club on fishing trips to Boston or the Boston area, and in one case to Tattershall, and that on the dates in question the respondent had no licence to use a vehicle as an express carriage. It was common ground that the user of the vehicle on each of the said dates without a licence was a contravention of s. 72 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, unless the user thereof came within the proviso to s. 61 (2) of that Act. That sub-section reads as follows:

"It is hereby declared that where persons are carried in a motor vehicle for any journey in consideration of separate payments made by them, whether to the owner of the vehicle or to any other person, the vehicle in which they are carried shall be deemed to be a vehicle carrying passengers for hire or reward at separate fares, whether the payments are solely in respect of the journey or not. Provided that a vehicle used on a special occasion for the conveyance of a private party shall not be deemed to be a vehicle carrying passengers for hire or reward at separate fares by reason only that the members of the party have made separate payments which cover their conveyance by that vehicle on that occasion."

It was also common ground that on each of the said days the conditions specified in s. 25 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, had been satisfied, and that the party on each day was a private party. Accordingly, the sole question for the justices was whether on the facts found the vehicle being used on any Sunday was being used on a "special occasion", and in this connection it appears that the justices were invited to deal with the matter on the basis that, if the user of the vehicle on the first Sunday was a user on a special occasion, the user on each of the other Sundays was also a user on a special occasion.

In dismissing the information the justices said:

"We were of opinion that these journeys were made in the nature of outings and were not of a general nature, but remained special, both by reason of the distance travelled, the purpose of the outings, and the place of the outings."

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that before it can be said that a vehicle is being used on a special occasion there must be some evidence that the journey is being undertaken to partake in what is a special occasion in the locality to which the journey is made, and that it is not enough that the journey itself is a special occasion from the point of view of the members of the party. In other words, it is said that, if there had been an annual angling match at Boston on the first Sunday concerned, the vehicle would have been used on a special occasion, but that, as there was no special event in progress, the use of the vehicle could not be a use on a special occasion, even if it was the party's annual outing.

Surprising as this may sound, and whatever views I might otherwise be inclined to hold, apart from authority, I consider that we are bound by the decision of this court in Miller v. Pill. Pill v. Furse. Pill v. J. Mutton & Son (1). In that case the owner of a motor omnibus hired the vehicle to one Rowe to take a party from Launceston to Looe. It was an annual event, Rowe having on each of the last four years arranged a similar trip to Looe. There was nothing at Looe which could be said to be a special occasion there. In his argument for the respondent the Solicitor-General posed the question in this way ([1933] 2 K.B. 312):

"... the important question in the case is whether 'special occasion' means, as the appellant contends, an occasion special to the private party, such as a day at the seaside, or whether, as the police contend, it has a more restricted meaning confined to an occasion special to the whole locality or to the public."

He went on to contend that "special occasion" in s. 61 (2) should be given the same meaning as in s. 61 (1) where it is clear that the words have the latter meaning. LORD HEWART, C.J. (ibid., 315), said:

"In my opinion, although the matter is by no means free from doubt there is great force in that argument. I think that it would be wrong and misleading if the term 'special occasion' were used in two different senses in the space of a few lines in the same section of the same Act of Parliament. The justices found as a fact that the occasion was not a special occasion and, although there may be much to be said to the opposite effect, I have come to the conclusion that the argument for the appellant is unsuccessful and that this appeal must be dismissed."

A AVORY, J. (ibid., 316), after expressing considerable doubt, said:

"My inclination at one time was to think that the words 'special occasion' in sub-s. (2) might have a different and more extended meaning than when they are used in sub-s. (1), and that the occasion under consideration should be regarded quoad the purpose of the private party to ascertain whether it was a 'special occasion' within the proviso to the sub-section.

B I am not, however, prepared to differ from the view that prima facie the words ought to be read in the same sense in the two sub-sections. I am satisfied to decide this case on the ground that there is no sufficient reason for differing from the finding of fact by the justices that the occasion was not a 'special occasion'."

C HUMPHREYS, J. (ibid., 318), said:

"On the point whether the occasion was a 'special occasion' within the proviso to s. 61 (2), if I were dealing with that proviso alone, I should come to the conclusion that the expression 'special occasion' refers to something more than the views and intentions of the members of the party and points to something which can be described as a special occasion in the locality and was the object of the journey being undertaken. And when I turn to the proviso to sub-s. (1) of the same section and find there the same expression as part of the phrase 'on occasions of race meetings, public gatherings and other like special occasions', it appears to me to be a strong indication that the view which I have expressed is right, because I think that the words in sub-s. (2) should be accorded the same meaning as those in sub-s. (1), from which they are separated by only a few lines of print. Accordingly, I agree that a 'special occasion' within the meaning of sub-s. (2) must be a special occasion occurring at the place which is the object of the excursion, or, in other words, something of the same nature as the kind of occasion referred to in the proviso to sub-s. (1), and that it is not enough that it should merely be a special occasion from the point of view of the persons forming the private party. I agree that the matter is by no means free from difficulty, but in the result I agree with the other members of the court."

It is to be observed that, unless the words in question had the restricted meaning contended for by the Solicitor-General, the court could not have upheld the conviction. Accordingly, I think that the decision in that case is binding on this court.

H It was, however, urged on the part of the respondent that s. 25 of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, which imposed conditions which have to be complied with before it can be said that the vehicle is used on a "special occasion" has in some way altered the position. Those conditions, however, as was held in Victoria Motors (Scarborough), Ltd. v. Wurzal (2), are not definitive of what is a special occasion, but are merely additional conditions to what, apart from them, would amount to a special occasion. Reading both the Acts together, as we are bound to do, I cannot see anything in s. 25 of the Act of 1934 which is so plainly inconsistent with the accepted construction of s. 61 (2) of the Act of 1930 as to necessitate one to hold that the latter sub-section has been impliedly amended. Indeed, when s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1934 was passed Parliament must be taken to have had in mind the principle enunciated in Miller v. Pill (1), and, if it had been desired to amend s. 61 (2) of the Act of 1930, plain words to that effect would surely have been used. Applying to the facts of this case the principle above referred to, it is plain that on no Sunday was the vehicle in question used on a special occasion.

I should add that it is, in my view, unfortunate that the justices were persuaded to deal with the matter on the basis of the concession made by the prosecution, and referred to above, namely, that, if the use of the vehicle on the first Sunday was use on a special occasion, the use on each of the other Sundays was also on a special occasion. Apart from this concession the frequency of the journeys would probably on any view of the meaning of "special occasion" have forced the justices and this court to hold that the offences had been proved. In the result, in my view, the Case should go back to the justices with a direction to convict. Sentence is, of course, a matter for them, but in the circumstances of this case they may well think that a nominal fine is appropriate.

I am to add that LYNSKEY, J., agrees with this judgment.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree that this court is bound by the previous decision in Miller v. Pill (1), and, consequently, this appeal must succeed. That case was not brought to the attention of the court when Victoria Motors (Scarborough), Ltd. v. Wurzel (2) was before us and would not have affected the decision if it had been. But I regret that in dealing there with what could amount to a special occasion I gave illustrations some of which I now see could not be so regarded in view of the decision in Miller v. Pill (1). It seems that a day's excursion, a Sunday school or mothers' union party, cannot be treated as a special occasion so long as that decision stands, and we cannot overrule it. It is only right that I should take responsibility for having misled the justices by the illustrations I gave per incuriam. But I may, I hope, be permitted to say with all respect that I feel great doubt about the decision in Miller v. Pill (1), and it is apparent that AVORY, J., who was a member of the court, also did, though he did not dissent. As we are bound by the decision, it is, perhaps, unprofitable to discuss it, but I desire to state quite briefly why I thought such occasions as I illustrated could be regarded as special in relation to the use of a motor vehicle by a private party. I agree that when the same words are used twice in a statute, prima facie they should be given the same construction, but the context may require a different interpretation.

The first proviso is not dealing with motor vehicles used by private parties, but with taxi-cabs or private hire cars in effect plying for hire and picking up casual travellers, thus competing with omnibuses. This is permitted only in connection with race meetings, public gatherings, and other like special occasions. To use a homely illustration, it provides for cabs at stations picking up passengers who may be travelling quite independently of one another and taking them at so much a head to a neighbouring race course or gathering. The second proviso deals with a private party who hire a motor coach for a special occasion, and the stringent provisions of s. 25 of the Act of 1934 must be satisfied before the party can be regarded as private. If it was intended to limit the use of the vehicle to journeys for attending such things as race meetings or public gatherings, I should have expected the proviso to make this clear by a reference to the previous proviso where, it will be observed, the word "like" appears, though it does not in the latter. From a common-sense angle I think most people would say that a village school treat was a special occasion, certainly in the lives of those attending it. The result of Miller v. Pill (1), however, seems to be that, if a treat were planned to a neighbouring seaside town and was fixed for a day on which a statue or a drinking fountain was to be unveiled as a memorial to a deceased mayor or member of Parliament, providing the children were obliged as part of their outing to attend this dismal festivity, the treat would be a special occasion, but otherwise it would not. The justices, therefore, came to a wrong decision on this matter, but it is I and the other members of the court who heard the Victoria Motors case (2) who ought to take the blame, if any.

A On another matter the justices were, in my opinion, also misled, this time by the prosecutor. The concession he made to which PARKER, J., has referred was, I think, incorrect, and should not have been made. The journeys to which the information related seem to have formed part of the ordinary programme of the fishing season, and though, but for Miller v. Pill (1), the first trip might have been regarded as a special occasion, I cannot see how seven consecutive Sunday outings could be. They were habitual and not special. I agree that the appeal must be allowed and cordially indorse the concluding sentence of the judgment of PARKER, J.

Appeal allowed.

HUTTON v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

C [CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), April 21, 22, 23, May 1, 1953.]

Income Tax—Interest—Interest on tax reserve certificates—Distribution to shareholders—Liability to tax—Finance Act, 1942 (c. 21), s. 29 (1).

D By the Finance Act, 1942, s. 29 (1), income tax was not to be chargeable in respect of the interest on tax reserve certificates issued by the Treasury. It was a term of the issue of the certificates that they would earn interest in so far as they were applied to payment of certain taxes, but carry no interest to the extent to which they were not so applied, principal and interest being applied in payment of tax on the surrender of a certificate. The interest was not returnable as part of the taxpayer's income or profit and so would not be liable to income tax, surtax, national defence contribution, or excess profits tax. A company purchased tax reserve certificates and surrendered them at various dates in payment of tax, being credited with interest thereon in further discharge of tax in accordance with their terms of issue. It subsequently distributed sums equal to the amount of the interest earned to shareholders in proportion to their shareholdings, without deducting tax.

F HELD: the effect of being credited with interest on tax reserve certificates was to increase the sum standing to the credit of the company's profit and loss account and not to create a separate tax-free fund, and tax was, therefore, payable on the sums distributed.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayer owned half of the issued share capital of Hutton Shoe Co., Ltd. In the course of its trading years from that ended on June 30, 1942, to that ended on June 30, 1946, the company purchased tax reserve certificates and surrendered them at various dates in payment of tax, being credited with interest thereon which was also applied in discharge of tax. From 1943 to 1948 the company annually paid sums equal to the total of such interest to the shareholders in proportion to their holdings of shares. Such payments were made without deduction of tax, interest on tax reserve certificates being exempt from income tax under the Finance Act, 1942, s. 29 (1). The terms of the issue of the certificates provided (i) that they would earn interest in so far as they were applied to the payment of certain taxes (the principal and interest being so applied on surrender), but not to the extent to which they were not so applied; and (ii) that the interest would not be returnable by the holder of the certificates as part of his income or profit and thus would not be liable to income tax, surtax, national defence contribution, or excess profits tax.

On Feb. 10, 1950, being advised that the payments should not have been made in that manner, the directors resolved that the payments to the two shareholders, then totalling £708 1s. 8d. to each of them, should be treated as reducing each of their loan accounts by that amount. Additional assessments to surtax were made on the taxpayer for the years 1943-44 to 1948-49 in the gross amounts of the payments of interest he had received on the basis that such payments represented net income in the taxpayer's hands after deduction of income tax. The taxpayer appealed. He contended that the interest was a profit of the company available for distribution to shareholders notwithstanding that it was required to be, and had been, applied towards payment of tax due from the company, that the distributions were dividends from a fund which was exempt from income tax, with the result that the sums received by him were non-taxable receipts in his hands, and the assessments were, therefore, bad. The Crown contended that the payments made to the taxpayer were not distributions of interest on tax reserve certificates, since such interest came into existence only for the purpose of discharging liability to tax, but were distributions out of general profits taxed in the hands of the company, and were so taxed income in the taxpayer's hands, and were properly the subject of additional assessments. The commissioners held that the interest came into being only for the purpose of meeting a corresponding tax liability and that the shareholders had no concern in it as a prospective or possible source of dividend to themselves and it was not available for dividend, and they dismissed the appeal. The taxpayer appealed.

Grant, Q.C., J. H. Stamp and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 1. UPJOHN, J., read the following judgment. This appeal raises a neat point whether a company, having made substantial savings in its cash liability to income tax by a prudent application of tax reserve certificates thereto, is entitled to distribute amongst its shareholders the amount of the interest earned by such certificates (such interest being admittedly tax free in the hands of the company) without deducting tax from such distribution.

Tax reserve certificates were created and issued as a result of a Treasury memorandum dated Dec. 22, 1941. By the terms of issue the certificates earned interest at one per cent. per annum, in so far as they were applied to payment of certain taxes, but carried no interest to the extent to which they were not so applied. The interest so earned would not be returnable by the holder as part of his income or profit and thus would not be liable to income tax, surtax, national defence contribution, or excess profits tax. Statutory authority for such exemption from tax was given by the Finance Act, 1942, s. 29 (1). There was a further issue of tax reserve certificates in 1946, but I am not concerned with that issue.

Shortly after the creation of such certificates a company known as the Hutton Shoe Co., Ltd., which I will call "the company", and in which at all material times the taxpayer was a holder of fifty per cent. of the shares, purchased tax reserve certificates to meet its income tax liabilities. It started by purchasing to the value of £10,400 certificates in 1942, and thereafter made purchases fairly regularly until the end of 1946, by which time it had purchased £148,600 of certificates. All but £2,000 of these certificates were regularly surrendered from time to time in discharge in whole or in part of its income tax liability, the last tax liability being that for the year ended June 30, 1950. The amount of interest credited to the company on payment of its tax in this way amounted to the aggregate sum of £1,456 3s. 4d. Thus, in the first year, 1943, the company applied in or towards discharge of its tax liability tax reserve certificates to the nominal value of £18,600 and was credited with interest thereon to the extent of £78 13s. 4d. and thereby discharged £18,678 13s. 4d. of its total tax liability for that year.

In the annual accounts of the company for that year, the amount of interest saved, £78, by thus discharging its income tax was shown as a separate credit in the profit and loss account. Then, by a resolution dated July 30, 1943, the company resolved that the sum of £78 13s. 4d. received in respect of interest on tax reserve certificates for the year to June 30, 1943, be paid direct to the shareholders individually in proportion to their holdings of shares as at June 30, 1943. The taxpayer, by virtue of his fifty per cent. shareholding, duly received in cash £39. This practice was regularly followed by the company throughout the relevant years. It will, however, be convenient, in dealing with the submissions made to me, to refer to the figures of 1943 by way of example.

The company claims to be entitled to distribute that sum of £78 without being bound to deduct tax pursuant to r. 20 of the All Schedules Rules on the ground that the distribution is in respect of interest on the tax reserve certificates, and, that interest not having borne tax in the hands of the company, it is neither bound nor entitled to deduct tax therefrom in making the distribution by way of dividend to the shareholders. It is not in dispute, having regard to the well-known principles laid down by LORD TOMLIN in Neumann v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) ([1934] A.C. 228, 229), that, if the company is entitled to regard the distribution of £78 as being the distribution of a sum which has not borne tax in its hands, then it is not entitled to deduct tax on making the payment, and that the sum so distributed is not subject to income tax or surtax in the hands of the payee. The sole question I have to consider is whether the company is entitled to regard the distribution as the distribution of a fund which has not borne tax in its hands.

Counsel for the taxpayer puts his case in this way. He says that the matter is one entirely of account and that it matters not that the interest on the tax reserve certificates was in fact applied, as it had to be, towards payment of the tax due from the company. In support of that submission he referred me to two cases to illustrate his general proposition: Montague Burton, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), and, in particular, to the observations of ROMER, L.J. (152 L.T. 16), and Thomas Fattorini (Lancashire), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3). In the latter case, a holding company had by contract bound itself to pay to its bankers in reduction of a loan dividends received from certain operating companies in which it was the principal shareholder, but it was held, nevertheless, that these dividends were properly a credit to the profit and loss account of the holding company, and, accordingly, it was entitled out of other available assets to pay a dividend corresponding to the amount of the dividends received. That, says counsel, is exactly the position here. VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 621):

"As regards para. 23, I agree that the contract with the bank did not bind the company not to distribute a dividend, and, inasmuch as the company made profits in each of the years in question, the fact that it used the dividends it received (as it was bound to do) in reducing the charge on the shares, did not make it unlawful to distribute a dividend. There is nothing in law to prevent a company using an income-receipt as cash in its hands to discharge a capital liability or to purchase a capital asset, and then, after the close of its financial year, paying a dividend out of other cash, or borrowing for the purpose, to the extent of the credit balance standing on profit and loss account. This was very clearly explained by my noble and learned friend LORD ROMER, when sitting in the Court of Appeal in Montague Burton, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) (152 L.T. 16), and his view was affirmed on appeal to this House, particularly in the speeches of LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., and of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN (154 L.T. 359, 360). The board of referees sought to distinguish the decision of ROWLATT, J., in Glazed Kid, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) where the company made a very similar arrangement to borrow from a bank the purchase price of shares on the terms that it paid over to the bank the dividends as received. MACNAGHTEN, J., in reversing the decision of the board of referees, declared himself unable to see the distinction and I agree with him. The judgments of ROWLATT, J. in income tax cases deserve, in my opinion, particular attention, but in this instance, with all respect to that judge, his view cannot be upheld. He said (15 Tax Cas. 456): ' . . . it is not open to anyone to say that they [the Glazed Kid Co.] have not distributed a reasonable part, when they could not distribute any part of what were their profits, because every penny of those profits, which solely consisted of these dividends, were under contract receivable by somebody else '. This is to confuse the use made of an income receipt to discharge a capital liability with the quite distinct question of the use of a credit balance on the profit and loss account to justify the distribution of a dividend."

The Crown concedes that the matter is one of account and the fact that the interest on the tax reserve certificates has been applied in payment of the tax liability taken in isolation is irrelevant. The argument of counsel for the taxpayer proceeds: The liability to taxation having been discharged by the surrender of tax reserve certificates, the general fund standing to the credit of profit and loss in the accounts of the company is increased by the sum of £78. He poses the question: How is that increase achieved? He says the source of that increase is quite plain. It is a perfectly ascertainable figure and represents the interest on surrendered tax reserve certificates. He submits that it does not form part of the general taxed funds standing to the credit of the profit and loss account because the interest is exempted from income tax and, therefore, it cannot be said that that particular item of £78 in the profit and loss account has been taxed. He further says that this sum cannot be regarded as arising from any diminution of the company's liability to income tax for the liability of the company to income tax is in no way diminished. It remains for the first year what it always has been, i.e., £18,678 13s. 4d. which has been discharged by the surrender of £18,600 of tax reserve certificates and interest thereon. He submits that this £78 is a sum apart from the ordinary trading and other profits made by the company, and is a sum which has not been taxed in the hands of the company. It is in truth tax-free interest on valuable securities, viz., tax reserve certificates purchased by the company. Therefore, he says, if the company likes to distribute that definite and ascertained sum by way of dividend, it is entitled to do so, and as it represents an untaxed fund in its hands it cannot deduct tax from it pursuant to r. 20, and so in the hands of the taxpayer it is free of income tax and surtax.

- A Counsel for the Crown admits that the fund standing to the credit of profit and loss account is increased by £78, and he admits that that item is available for distribution by way of dividend, but he says tax must be deducted. He submits that that is so for two reasons. First, he says that the company can only receive interest on the tax reserve certificates by applying them towards tax. Therefore, he says, the interest no longer exists, and all that has happened
- B is that the general fund of taxed profits has been increased in this sense, that a smaller sum, smaller by £78, has had to be applied out of those profits in payment of the relevant tax liability, but that sum appearing in the general fund of profit and loss never represented the interest on the tax reserve certificates. Secondly, he says that the company's action has been inconsistent, and that, having applied the interest in payment of tax, it cannot now contend that
- C that item of interest is now in the general fund of profit and loss representing that interest.

- In support of that submission he referred me to two cases. The first is Birmingham Corpn. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5). That was a complicated case and the actual decision went on an entirely different point. Briefly the facts were these. Birmingham Corporation borrowed money for a housing
- D scheme and in accordance with the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919, they were entitled to recoupment from the Crown of loss made on that scheme, subject to a certain contribution. As part of that loss they showed, as they were entitled to, the interest on the money borrowed for the purpose of the scheme. Of course, when they had paid interest to the lenders they had deducted income tax, but they showed in their loss for the purpose of the subsidy the
- E gross amount of the interest. That would be right if they had paid the interest out of funds which had not borne tax in their hands, and they would then be accountable to the Revenue for the sum so deducted having regard to r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules. Later, for the purposes of income tax, the corporation claimed in effect that the interest on the borrowed money had been paid
- F out of their taxed funds, and, therefore, that they were entitled, pursuant to r. 19, to retain tax deducted from the interest payable to the lenders. The House of Lords said that that was quite inconsistent, and that, having claimed against one department of the Crown that they had paid the interest out of capital, they could not then claim against another department of the same person, the Crown, that they had paid the interest out of income. It was said by LORD ATKIN that the original claim to the subsidy was conclusive proof
- G that the corporation had in fact paid the interest out of untaxed funds.

The second case was Central London Ry. Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6), and again the decision was on an entirely different point, but it was held by the House of Lords that the taxpayers were making quite inconsistent claims. As LORD MACMILLAN said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 385):

- H "My Lords, I do not think that the same sum can be utilised by the railway company to render them those two inconsistent services in the same tax year, so as to entitle them first to attribute the £2,340 ls. 11d. to the payment of interest to their creditors and claim to retain the tax deducted therefrom as if it were paid out of revenue and then by debiting it to capital to enhance the dividend fund and claim to regain the tax deducted from their shareholders on paying them their dividends. Whatever view be taken of the meaning of r. 19, I do not think that the railway company can bring such a case within it."

Those two cases were very special cases, as was pointed out by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Allchin v. Coulthard (7) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 45). That case went to the House of Lords where the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was approved in its entirety, and VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 356):

"Neither is there anything in the present case which goes to show that they have precluded themselves by inconsistent action, as was the case in Birmingham Corp'n. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), from being treated as paying the interest out of profits and gains brought into charge. The corporation claims to be so treated, and the claim is justified."

In my judgment, those two cases relied on by the Crown have no application to the case before me. They depended on the existence of a factual inconsistency, i.e., if for one purpose a company says it has made a payment out of fund A, it cannot, at all events against the same person (the Crown) for another purpose, say it made the payment out of fund B. There is no inconsistent claim here set up by the taxpayer. He says, and relies on the fact, that he has surrendered tax reserve certificates in payment of his tax and has received interest thereon, but he says, for the reasons that I have already endeavoured to summarise, that the result of that transaction is to produce as an item in his profit and loss account a sum of £78 which is a tax-free item in his accounts. If he is right on that, he has done nothing inconsistent with his surrender of tax reserve certificates and interest in discharge of his income tax liability. In truth, this case gives rise to a short, but, to me, difficult, point.

In my judgment, the true solution is to be found in these considerations. The company in the course of carrying on its business has made profits. On those profits it has to pay tax, and it can pay tax in two ways, either by waiting for the due date and then paying cash out of its general fund standing to the credit of profit and loss, or by making an estimate of its tax liabilities and making provision by the purchase of tax reserve certificates well in advance of the due date, and in due course surrendering those tax reserve certificates and claiming interest thereon. If the company follows the latter course, the result is that its general fund standing to the credit of profit and loss is larger than it otherwise would be or, what comes to the same thing, it has had to deplete that fund by less than it would have had to had it paid its tax in cash. All that has happened is that the general fund standing to the credit of profit and loss has been swollen by the sum of £78. The case is analogous to receiving a discount on a trade debt. The company is left with a larger general fund to the credit of profit and loss and not with a separate item in its profit fund representing a tax-free item. Accordingly, in my judgment, the Special Commissioners reached a correct decision. In the result, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Re WARRE'S WILL TRUSTS. WORT AND ANOTHER v.
SALISBURY DIOCESAN BOARD OF FINANCE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), April 28, 1953.]

Charity—Uncertainty—Absolute discretion of trustees.

Charity—Religion—Public benefit—Establishment of a “retreat house”.

A By her will a testatrix gave her residuary estate to the Salisbury Diocesan Board of Finance as holding trustee on trust, inter alia, to establish a scheme for the use of her residence, and, after appointing certain persons to be the administrative trustees, she directed: “The precise form of the scheme and therefore the final trusts of this my will shall be settled by the administrative trustees in their absolute discretion but for the guidance of such administrative trustees in settling such scheme I now set out a rough outline which sets out my wishes:—‘The property and income . . . to be applied to the provision and upkeep of (i) a house of residence for the Saint Andrews’ Missioners . . . and/or (ii) a retreat house . . .’” She directed further that such part of the income of the residue as should not be required for the maintenance of (i) and (ii), should be applied to making grants to certain ecclesiastical charities, and, finally, “. . . should such scheme ultimately in the opinion of . . . the trustees . . . not be found to be of the best service in furthering the spread of Christianity . . .”, then she provided certain charitable alternatives. On a summons to determine whether the trusts were valid charitable trusts,

D HELD: if the wishes of the testatrix mentioned in the “outline” were merely precatory, as appeared to be the case, then the trustees had an absolute discretion as to the nature of the scheme, and the trust was void for uncertainty; alternatively, if the wishes were mandatory, the trust was nevertheless void because a retreat house was a non-charitable object, it lacking the element of public benefit essential to render a purpose charitable: Cocks v. Manners (1871) (L.R. 12 Eq. 574), applied; the fact that the additional and alternative objects provided by the testatrix for the application of the income of the residue were valid charitable objects could not preserve the trusts if the preceding objects were non-charitable; and, therefore, the trusts, not being exclusively charitable, were void for uncertainty.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the provisions contained in the will of the testatrix with regard to her residuary estate and commencing with the words “And ultimately to establish a scheme” were (a) valid charitable trusts, or (b) void for uncertainty.

By her will dated June 10, 1937, Agnes Margaret Warre appointed the plaintiffs to be her executors and trustees, and, after giving the residue of her estate to her trustees on trust for the Salisbury Diocesan Board of Finance, and setting out a number of bequests, not here relevant, she continued:

"And ultimately to establish a scheme for the future of my present residence and its use and in such scheme it shall be provided that the holding trustee shall be the board and that the administrative trustees shall be the Bishop of Salisbury for the time being the said Gerald Burton Allen Francis Herbert Wort and Percy John Dale two persons either clergymen of the Church of England or laymen nominated by the Bishop of Salisbury and three laymen nominated by the board my idea being that so far as may be the administrative trustees shall consist as to half of clergymen and half of laymen. The precise form of the scheme and therefore the final trusts of this my will shall be settled by the administrative trustees in their absolute discretion but for the guidance of such administrative trustees in settling such scheme I now set out a rough outline which sets out my wishes:—"The property and income to be derived therefrom to be applied to the provision and upkeep of (i) a house of residence for the Saint Andrews' Missioners either as at present constituted or in any re-constituted form and/or (ii) a retreat house . . . So much of the income as shall not in the judgment of the trustees be required for the upkeep of the house church and other buildings and for the diocesan use of the premises as a house for Saint Andrews' Missioners or a retreat house and the expenses thereof with a suitable reserve for future needs shall be applied to making grants for (i) training of ordination candidates including those intending to offer themselves for missionary dioceses and (ii) to the National Society but should such scheme ultimately in the opinion of the bishop the administrative trustees and the committee not be found to be of the best service in furthering the spread of Christianity at home or abroad this alternative may be adopted (a) to use or allocate the house and as much of the property as may be required for some other religious purpose and (b) sell that not required for that purpose and devote the proceeds of sale together with the income arising therefrom to the objects above mentioned."

The testatrix died on May 21, 1946. Evidence was given that by "National Society" the testatrix was referring to the National Society for Promoting Religious Education in accordance with the Principles of the Church of England.

Rawlence for the first defendant, the Salisbury Diocesan Board of Finance.

J. V. Nesbitt for the second defendant, one of the next of kin.

HARMAN, J., stated the facts and continued: There are two views. One is that the administrative trustees have an absolute discretion to establish a scheme for the future use of the residence, and the other is that they are limited to the purposes set out in what is called the "rough outline," which must be considered as mandatory and not merely as an expression of the wishes of the testatrix. Should the first view be right—as I am inclined to think it is—then, in my judgment, there are no limits on what the administrative trustees may direct, and the fact that the holding trustee, which is to establish the scheme in the first place, may have exclusively charitable objects, seems to me not to make any difference. Therefore, even if a gift to the Salisbury Diocesan Board of Finance for its general purposes were essentially a gift for charitable objects, this being a gift to the board purely as trustees, it is not such a gift since the board is to establish a scheme which may or may not have anything to do with its own objects. If, therefore, on the true construction of this will—that being the view to which I am inclined—the wishes of the testatrix are merely precatory and not mandatory, I should hold the gift void for uncertainty.

A Should I be wrong in that view, and the so-called wishes are mandatory, then it remains to be seen whether those wishes themselves are exclusively charitable. The first wish expressed by the testatrix relates to the use of her residence for St. Andrews' Missioners. That I need not investigate further, because the St. Andrews' Missioners had ceased to be actively in existence well before the date of her will. Their activities were not officially wound up until a somewhat later date, but that object has always been impossible at any date when the administrative trustees could have started a scheme.

B The testatrix proposed, secondly, what she called a retreat house, and this phrase is explained as meaning a house devoted to a form of religious activity or inactivity which is known as a "retreat", and that is a form of religious experience well understood in the Church of England. It is a retirement from the activities of the world for a space of time for religious contemplation and the cleansing of the soul. No doubt that is a highly beneficial activity for the person who undertakes it, but it is not in English law a charitable activity. In Cocks v. Manners (1), which was recently confirmed by the House of Lords in Gilmour v. Coats (2), SIR JOHN WICKENS, V.-C., said (L.R. 12 Eq. 585):

C "A voluntary association of women for the purpose of working out their own salvation by religious exercises and self-denial seems to me to have none of the requisites of a charitable institution, whether the word 'charitable' is used in its popular sense or in its legal sense. It is said, in some of the cases, that religious purposes are charitable, but that can only be true as to religious services tending directly or indirectly towards the instruction or the edification of the public . . ."

D Gilmour v. Coats (2) was concerned with a trust for a certain Roman Catholic priory which consisted of cloistered nuns, who devoted their life to prayer, contemplation, penance and self-sanctification within their convent and engaged in no exterior works. There was evidence as to the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church with regard to the benefit conferred by the contemplative life, not only on those who followed it themselves, but also through the efficacy of their intercessory prayers. The House of Lords held that the element of public benefit essential to render a purpose charitable applied equally to religious as to other charities. By that decision, therefore, the House declined to go beyond the doctrine of Cocks v. Manners (1).

E Activities which do not in any way affect the public or any section of it are not charitable. Pious contemplation and prayer are, no doubt, good for the soul, and may be of benefit by some intercessory process, of which the law takes no notice, but they are not charitable activities. It follows, then, that if the purposes indicated by way of confining the absolute discretion given to the trustees include a purpose which is not charitable, the trustees are, on this view, enjoined to embark on a purpose which is not charitable.

G At the end of the paragraph in which the wishes of the testatrix are set out, there is a "sweeping up" clause including objects which are themselves, no doubt, charitable, but that cannot preserve the objects going before them if they are not charitable. Similarly, there is a discretion given to the administrative trustees, if they find that the wishes set out in the "rough outline" are not serving the testatrix's purpose, which she describes as "furthering the spread of Christianity", to adopt certain alternatives which on the face of them look as if they are charitable purposes. The fact that the testatrix thought her purpose would serve the cause or spread of Christianity does not make the purpose charitable and prevent these trusts from being bad.

I hold that these trusts, not being exclusively charitable, are void for uncertainty, and I conclude that this residuary gift fails, and that the residue passes as on intestacy to the representatives of the sister of the testatrix.

Order accordingly.

GREEN v. PORTSMOUTH STADIUM, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), April 27, 1953.]

Bookmaker—Admission charge to racing track—Excessive charge—Recovery of excess by bookmaker—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 13 (1), (2).

A bookmaker alleged that over a period of years he had been overcharged for admission to a licensed greyhound racing track, contrary to s. 13 (1) and (2) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and he claimed from the occupiers of the track the excess amount so paid, as money had and received by them to his use.

HELD: as penalties for a breach of s. 13 of the Act of 1934 were provided by s. 16 (1) (d) and s. 30 (2), and as the Act contained no provision that an amount paid in excess of that permitted by s. 13 (1) should be recoverable, a civil action did not lie for a breach of the section: Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 544), applied; and, therefore, as the bookmaker's claim for money had and received was based on payments alleged to have been made in contravention of s. 13 (1) and (2), he had no right of action, notwithstanding that he was not seeking to enforce directly an obligation created by the section.

Observations of LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., in Browning v. Morris (1778) (2 Cowp. 792), explained.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants from an order of PARKER, J., dated Feb. 20, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 642, on a point of law ordered to be tried under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2, in an action by the plaintiff for money paid to the defendants under a mistake of fact, or, alternatively, for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff.

At various times between 1941 and 1947 the plaintiff, who was a bookmaker, carried on business at the Portsmouth Stadium Greyhound Racing Track, which was occupied by the defendants. He alleged that, during this period, he had been charged an admission fee of £2 per meeting, an excess charge of £1 8s. 9d. per meeting, and he had, therefore, been overcharged for admission to the track, contrary to s. 13 (1) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934. He claimed £585 as the excess amount so paid. The defendants contended, inter alia, (i) that any payments which the plaintiff had made were under a mistake of law and were illegal, and, therefore, irrecoverable; and (ii) that any payments which he had made were not recoverable by reason of any matter set out in the statement of claim, or by reason of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, or at all, and that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action. By an order dated Oct. 20, 1952, the master ordered that the issues raised in (i) should be tried as a preliminary point of law, and, by consent of the parties, the order was amended to include the issue raised in (ii). PARKER, J., determined the issues in favour of the plaintiff, on the ground that his claim was for money had and received and was not a claim under the Act of 1934.

Montagu, Q.C., and McLellan for the defendants.

R. Hughes for the plaintiff.

DENNING, L.J.: This is a proceeding analogous to a demurrer. The defendants seek to dispose of the action in limine on the ground that the statement of claim does not disclose a cause of action. The plaintiff alleges that he was a bookmaker and that the defendants were the occupiers of the Portsmouth Stadium Greyhound Racing Track, which was licensed under the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934. He says that for many years he went to the stadium in his capacity as a bookmaker and paid £2 for admission each time that he went there. Under s. 13 (1) of the Act the racecourse authorities are not entitled to charge a bookmaker more than five times the amount of the charge to the public. In the part of the track to which the plaintiff went, the charge to the public was 2s. 3d., and he says, therefore, that the highest amount which he should have been charged was 11s. 3d. Therefore, he claims in this action the sum of £1 8s. 9d. for each occasion that he was admitted to the track, on the ground that it was an overcharge.

In considering whether the statement of claim discloses a cause of action, it must be observed that there is no allegation that the plaintiff was under any mistake of fact. Nor is there any allegation that he was under a mistake of law, or that he was oppressed or imposed on in any way. We must assume, on the pleading, that the plaintiff knew that the lawful charge was 11s. 3d., and that, nevertheless, he voluntarily chose to pay £2 to the defendants, and now he seeks to recover the excess paid. He does not, and cannot, claim for money paid on a consideration that has wholly failed, as he has had the consideration, i.e., he has gone into the track and conducted his bookmaking operations there. The only ground on which he claims the money is that there was a breach of s. 13 of the Act of 1934, in that he was charged more than the amount permitted by s. 13 (1).

The question whether a breach of a statute can be made the foundation of an action depends on the interpretation of the statute itself. Section 13 (1) of the Act of 1934 specifies that no charge exceeding five times the charge to the public can be made to a bookmaker, and s. 13 (2), which is the important sub-section, provides:

"If any charge other than a charge authorised by the preceding sub-section is made to a bookmaker or an assistant of a bookmaker, or if any payment, valuable thing or favour, other than a charge so authorised, is demanded or received by or for the benefit of the occupier of a track as a consideration for facilities being given to a bookmaker for the carrying on of his business, the person immediately responsible and also the occupier of the track shall be guilty of an offence."

It is most significant that the Act does not say that the overcharge shall be recoverable. In modern statutes, such as the Rent Restrictions Acts, dealing with such things as premiums, if it is intended that an overcharge shall be recoverable, the Act says so. Section 13 (2) of the Act of 1934 only says that the person responsible shall be guilty of an offence. By s. 30 (2) of the Act a person guilty of an offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50 for the first offence, and on conviction on indictment the fine may be as much as £300. Moreover, under s. 16 (1) (d), on conviction of an offence the racecourse proprietors can have their licence taken away. On the face of the statute those are the only penalties provided in the case of an overcharge. The presumption is that, where the statute provides those consequences for a breach, no other remedy is available. A

It was sought to say, however, that by implication an action would lie to recover the overpayments. The decision of the House of Lords in Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd. (1) seems to me to make that proposition almost unarguable. There the House of Lords held that a breach of s. 11 (2) (b) of the Act, which provides that space on the track must be made available for bookmakers, did not give rise to a civil action, but could be enforced only by prosecution for a criminal offence. That was an action for a number of declarations, an injunction and damages, and it failed. The House considered the statute as a whole, and Part I of the Act [which contains s. 1 to s. 20] in particular, and they said that the Act was not passed for the protection of the bookmakers. It is not a bookmakers' charter. It is for the regulation of racecourses, and the mode of regulation is by means of the criminal courts, and not by way of civil action. B

Applying that decision to this case, it is clear that a breach of s. 13 does not give rise to an action for damages. But the point which impressed PARKER, J., was that this was not an action for a declaration, or for an injunction, or for damages. It was an action for money had and received, to which different considerations might apply. Reference was made to the judgment of LORD MANSFIELD in Browning v. Morris (2), where he said (2 Cowp. 792): C

"But, where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive statutes, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another set of men; the one, from their situation and condition, being liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other; there, the parties are not in pari delicto; and in furtherance of these statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract." D

In my judgment, those observations of LORD MANSFIELD apply only to cases where the statute, on its true construction, contemplates the possibility of a civil action. He said that it was "in furtherance of these statutes" that the action for money had and received could be brought. Just as in an action for damages, so, also, in an action for money had and received, it is a question of the true interpretation of the statute whether an action lies so as to recover the overcharge. I see nothing in the Act of 1934 to authorise such an action. I can conceive of cases where bookmakers might themselves aid and abet a breach of the statute. Some rich bookmakers might willingly pay more than the statutory amount to get a privileged position for themselves as against their poorer brethren. Clearly, such people could not recover the overpayments. Nor can the plaintiff here. The breach of s. 13, standing by itself, does not give rise to a claim for repayment. In my judgment, this appeal should be allowed, and the preliminary objection upheld. E F G H

HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The plaintiff, having been subjected to what he describes as an illegal overcharge in contravention of s. 13 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, has tried to recover the money, saying that he is not in pari delicto with the defendants and relying on the well-known passage from LORD MANSFIELD's judgment (2 Cowp. 792) in Browning v. Morris (2), which has already been read. The short answer to that point seems to me to be that the plaintiff has not pleaded any facts tending to show that he is not in pari delicto with the defendants. If the defendants have broken the law, as far as the pleadings go he has been as much a party to breaking it as they have.

A The main argument was, however, based on the decision of the House of Lords in Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd. (1), in which the judgment of the Court of Appeal dealing with the Act of 1934 was affirmed. This court and the House of Lords made it plain that the Act was not passed for the benefit of bookmakers (a class of persons to which the plaintiff belongs), and that there was no reason to infer from anything in the Act, it not being so expressly stated, that civil proceedings were open to anyone who complained of a breach of the Act. Criminal proceedings are contemplated, and the obligations imposed by the Act are enforceable only by criminal proceedings. Therefore, it is not an Act such as the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, which was described by A. L. SMITH, L.J. ([1898] 2 Q.B. 406), in Groves v. Lord Wimborne (3), as:

B “ . . . a public Act passed in favour of the workers in factories and workshops to compel their employers to do certain things for their protection and benefit.”

C In the present case, PARKER, J., came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not, as was the plaintiff in Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd. (1), seeking to enforce directly an obligation created by s. 13 of the Act. The claim being for money had and received, the learned judge thought ([1953] 1 All E.R. 644) that, although the plaintiff was seeking indirectly to enforce the obligation laid down by the section, he was not debarred from putting forward his claim. D With all respect to the learned judge, I do not think that there is any escape for the plaintiff from the effect of the decision in Cutler's case (1). The claim for money had and received is based on the payment which is said to have been made in contravention of s. 13 of the Act. The plaintiff cannot bring a civil action for breach of that section, and that is what he is seeking to do. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

JOHNSON v. A. H. BEAUMONT, LTD. (first defendants and third parties), and FORD MOTOR CO. (second defendants).

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), April 28, 29, 1953.]

Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Negligence—Unloading ship—Injury to trimmer during temporary absence of signaller—Defective lighting of ship—Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 279), reg. 3, reg. 12, reg. 43.

The plaintiff, employed as a trimmer by the first defendants, was engaged in unloading iron ore from the hold of a ship at the wharf of the second defendants, the first defendants being under a contract with the second defendants to provide trimmers for the unloading. The unloading was done by means of a grab under the control of a signaller and a craneman in the employment of the second defendants, who were in general control of the unloading. When the level of the ore in the hold was reduced it was the duty of the trimmers to shovel ore into the centre of the hold so that the grab could operate on it. The unloading was proceeding and the trimmers had already shovelled some ore into the centre of the hold, when the grab in its ascent caught an electric light cable suspended from the hatch coaming and extinguished a light. The signaller shouted that he was going to get another bulb and left his post, directing the craneman to continue to grab in the centre of the hold "where you can see". The craneman lowered the grab into the half-lighted hold where it came down on and crushed the plaintiff's foot. In an action by the plaintiff for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty against both defendants, HELD: (i) the obligation under the Docks Regulations, 1934, reg. 43, to employ a signaller when a cargo is being unloaded by a fall at a hatchway was not complied with by the mere contractual appointment of a man to act as signaller; the regulation contemplated that the signaller must be present whenever any act of unloading was taking place, and, if a workman was injured during, and by reason of, the temporary absence of a signaller, his employer was liable for breach of his statutory duty; both defendants, by themselves, their agents or workmen were carrying on the processes of unloading within para. (d) of the provisions of the regulations headed Duties, and the plaintiff had not passed from the service of the first defendants to that of the second defendants; and, therefore, both defendants were liable to the plaintiff as being in breach of their duty under reg. 43.

Garrard v. Southey & Co. Davey Estates, Ltd. (Third Parties) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 597), distinguished.

(ii) but reg. 3 of the regulations, which provides for the efficient lighting of "all places in which persons employed are employed and any dangerous parts of the regular road or way over a dock, wharf, or quay, forming the approach to any such place from the nearest highway", had no application to the lighting of a ship;

(iii) nor was there any breach of reg. 12 (which provides for the efficient lighting of ships in which work is being done, the primary responsibility for such lighting being put by para. (d) of the provisions headed Duties on the owner, master or officer in charge of the ship) as, by reg. 50, it is the duty of the employers to comply with these regulations only if the persons primarily responsible do not "within the shortest time reasonably practicable after such failure", and after the sudden failure of the light prompt steps were taken to put it right.

ACTION by the plaintiff, James Johnson, a ship's trimmer, claiming damages from his employers, A. H. Beaumont, Ltd. (the first defendants), and the Ford Motor Co. (the second defendants), in respect of personal injuries received by him as a result of the breach by the defendants of their statutory duty under the Docks Regulations, 1934, reg. 3, reg. 12, and reg. 43.

On Jan. 27, 1951, the plaintiff was engaged with others in the unloading of iron ore from the s.s. Wellington Court which was moored to the second defendant's jetty at Dagenham. The method of discharge of the ore was by means of a grab running off a gantry owned and operated by the second defendants, the grab being let down into the hold by a craneman and under the control of a "signaller" or "hatchway man" or "top man", both these men being in the employment of the second defendants. When the holds were first opened the grab operated alone and grabbed down into the bulk of the cargo in the square of the hatch, but, as the level in the hold decreased, it became necessary for trimmers in the hold to trim the ore by means of shovels from the wings and ends of the hold so as to bring the ore into the square of the hatch where the grab could operate on it. The trimmers were supplied by the first defendants under a trimming contract with the second defendants. The whole operation of unloading was under the general control of the second defendants' foreman, but the first defendants also had a foreman trimmer whose duty it was to supervise the allocation of the trimmers to the right holds and generally to supervise their work. The second defendants brought in the first defendants as third parties, and, under the contract between them, claimed an indemnity from the first defendants for any damages they were ordered to pay the plaintiff.

On Jan. 27, 1951, the plaintiff was working in No. 5 hold of the ship. The hold had been partially emptied and the trimmers had trimmed the ore from the ends of the hold into the square of the hatch. For some time before the accident the grab had been in operation under the control of the foreman and the trimmers were, or should have been, under cover. As the grab was ascending it caught the cable of one of the two electric lights which were suspended from the hatchway coamings with the result that the light suspended from the forward end went out. Thereupon the signaller shouted out: "I am going to get another bulb", and told the craneman: "You can go down in the centre and take out some ore where you can see". The signaller then left his post, and the craneman allowed his grab to descend into the half-lighted hold with the result that it came down on the plaintiff's foot and crushed it. Later, the plaintiff's leg had to be amputated below the knee. Without an admission of liability by the defendants damages were agreed at £3,500. His LORDSHIP found as a fact that the plaintiff had not been negligent, and that the effective causes of the accident were (i) the act of the signaller in leaving his post and telling the craneman to grab in the centre, and (ii) the act of the craneman in lowering his grab into the hold without signals when he knew, or ought to have known, that men might be there.

McNAIR, J., stated the facts and his findings and continued: On those findings I have first to consider whether any such breach of statutory duty, as is alleged, by either of the defendants is established. The first regulation relied on is reg. 3 of the Docks Regulations, 1934, which, so far as material, is in the following terms:

"All places in which persons employed are employed and any dangerous parts of the regular road or way over a dock, wharf, or quay, forming the approach to any such place from the nearest highway, shall be efficiently lighted . . ."

The duty of complying with that regulation is imposed by para. (a) of the portion of the regulations dealing with Duties on

" . . . the person having the general management and control of a dock, wharf, or quay . . .", which, on the facts of this case, is quite clearly the second defendants, the Ford Motor Co., Ltd. But I feel very considerable doubt, and, indeed, the balance of my mind is quite clearly against the view, that reg. 3 has any application at all to the lighting of a ship.

I think it has not, because that subject-matter is dealt with in the next regulation, to which I will refer, reg. 12—the second regulation relied on—which is in these terms:

"When the processes are being carried on—(a) the places in the hold and on the decks where work is being carried on . . . (c) all parts of the ship to which persons employed may be required to proceed in the course of their employment, shall be efficiently lighted, due regard being had to the safety of the ship and cargo, of all persons employed and of the navigation of other vessels . . ."

The duty of complying with that regulation is imposed primarily by para. (b) of the provisions in the regulations relating to "Duties" on " . . . the owner, master, or officer in charge of the ship." That is, however, subject to the qualification introduced by reg. 50, which provides that :

"If the persons whose duty it is to comply with regs. 9, 10 and 12 fail so to do, then it shall also be the duty of the employers of the persons employed for whose use the means of access and the lights are required, to comply with the said regulations within the shortest time reasonably practicable after such failure."

On the facts of this case, the failure of the light being due to this sudden accident and prompt steps being taken to put it right, I cannot see that there is any evidence that, within the meaning of reg. 50, there had been any failure by either of the defendants to comply with the regulations "within the shortest time reasonably practicable". Accordingly, my view is that there is no breach established of either reg. 3 or reg. 12.

I now come to reg. 43, which deals with the signaller, and it is in these terms:

"When cargo is being loaded or unloaded by a fall at a hatchway, a signaller shall be employed, and where more than one fall is being worked at a hatchway, a separate signaller shall be employed to attend to each fall."

It has been established by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ashworth v. J. McGuirk & Co., Ltd. (1), that the obligation to employ a signaller during certain processes of unloading ships which is imposed by the regulation I have read is not complied with by the mere contractual appointment of a man to act as signaller. The regulation contemplates that the signaller must be present whenever any act of unloading takes place, and, therefore, if a workman is injured during, and by reason of, the temporary absence of a signaller, his employer is liable for breach of statutory duty. I need not read the passage in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 447), where he sets out, if I may say so respectfully, in very cogent argument, why that is the proper construction of the regulation.

The next question to consider is whose duty it is to comply with reg. 43. That matter is dealt with by para. (d) of the provisions dealing with Duties, where it says it is the duty of

in which reg. 43 finds place. It is, in my judgment, quite plain that the second defendants, the Ford Motor Co., Ltd., were persons who, by themselves or their agents or workmen, were carrying on "the processes", processes including the process of unloading, and they, in particular, were carrying on the part of the processes which above all required the presence of a signaller at all times at the hatchway. Plainly, therefore, in my judgment, the Ford Motor Co., Ltd. are liable to the plaintiff for breach of the statutory duty imposed by reg. 43. Messrs. Beaumont, too, in my judgment, were by themselves or their workmen carrying on part of the processes of unloading, i.e., the trimming in the hold. There is, as I see it, no reason at all why, at any rate, vis-à-vis their workmen, they should not be held responsible for a failure to provide and keep in position a signaller, whose presence was essential for the safety of their men below.

D It was argued on the basis of Garrard v. Southey & Co. Davey Estates, Ltd. (Third Parties) (2), that, in as much as the plaintiff had for the time being passed into the service of Messrs. Ford's and had left the service of Beaumont's, Beaumont's were not liable under this regulation, but, on examination, it seems to me that the facts in Garrard v. Southey & Co. (2) were very different from the facts of this case. In that case the electricians in question, the servants of the first defendants, who had been lent to the second defendants, had passed wholly under their control, and, therefore, it was reasonable to consider that, pro hac vice, they had become the servants of the second defendants. But, as appears from a quotation from VISCOUNT SIMON's speech in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool), Ltd. (3) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 348), a very heavy burden of proof

F " . . . rests upon the general or permanent employer . . . to shift the prima facie responsibility for the negligence of servants engaged and paid by such employer so that this burden in a particular case may come to rest on the hirer who for the time being has the advantage of the service rendered. And, in my opinion, this burden is a heavy one and can only be discharged in quite exceptional circumstances."

G I am quite clear on the evidence here that that burden has not been shifted, and, furthermore, in so far as PARKER, J., in Garrard v. Southey & Co. (2) relied, as a second ground for his judgment, on a breach of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), the particular regulation with which he was concerned were in very different terms from reg. 43. Accordingly, I hold that both the defendants are liable for breach of the statutory duty contained in reg. 43.

H It is not strictly necessary for me to consider the common law position, but, as it has been argued, it is right that I should deal with that matter shortly. In the particulars of negligence set out in the statement of claim it is said that:

"The defendants, or one of them, failed properly to supervise the said unloading or to take adequate precautions to safeguard the plaintiff in his said work."

In my judgment, on the facts I have stated, there was adequate supervision provided by Messrs. Ford's, and as regards Messrs. Beaumont, it seems to me that, once they had satisfied themselves, as they did, that a good system of work was in operation, they were under no obligation to keep continuously a foreman supervising at each hold. I think the support for that is to be found in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P., presiding in the Court of Appeal, in Holt v. W. H. Rhodes & Son, Ltd. (4). As regards the fourth and fifth allegations of negligence, which are allegations of negligence against Ward, the second defendants' foreman, and their craneman, I think on my findings of fact those particulars of negligence are established, and, accordingly, the second defendants would be liable at common law to the plaintiff vicariously for the negligence of their two servants, Ward, the foreman, and the craneman operating the grab. Those findings involve that there must be judgment for the plaintiff against each of the defendants for the agreed sum of £3,500. My judgment is based primarily on my finding that both the defendants were in breach of reg. 43 of the Docks Regulations.

[HIS LORDSHIP then went on to consider the contract under which the first defendants supplied trimmers to the second defendants and came to the conclusion that under the terms of that contract the second defendants were entitled to an indemnity from the first defendants for any sum they might become liable to pay and did pay to the plaintiff.]

Re ROOKE'S WILL TRUSTS. TAYLOR v. ROOKE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 1, 1953.]

Trust and Trustee—Trust for sale and conversion—Trust to sell as soon as possible —Power to postpone—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 25 (1).

Will—Substitutionary gift to issue—Whether original gift divested if gift over fails.

By his will, dated Oct. 8, 1948, a testator directed his trustees that "if my house farm lands and premises known as Woodhouse . . . and my live and dead stock have not been sold at the time of my decease to as soon as possible after my death sell the same and . . . the net proceeds shall fall into and form part of my residuary estate." He gave his residuary estate to his trustees "upon trust to permit and allow" his wife "to receive and enjoy the net income . . . thereof during her life" and on her death he directed the trustees "to sell call in and convert the same into money and . . . pay and divide the net proceeds . . . equally between" his brother S. and his three sisters M., L., and G., and provided that "in case of either of my brother or sisters shall be dead at the time of my wife's decease I give their respective share of my residuary estate to their respective issue . . ." He directed further that his trustees during the life of the widow "may . . . have full power to sell or vary all or any part of my estate and may retain any investment that my estate may consist of at my death . . ." G., a spinster, survived the testator, but predeceased the widow.

HELD: (i) the words of the testator directing a sale of the farm were sufficiently imperative in their context to make them inconsistent with a discretionary power of postponement, and, therefore, there appeared a "contrary intention" within the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 25 (1), sufficient to exclude the power to postpone sale to be implied under that section.

(ii) on the true construction of the will, the gift to the issue of the testator's brother and sisters was merely substitutionary, and, therefore, as the substitution was in favour of issue of the primary beneficiaries, the gift to G. should be construed as being intended to remain vested unless the substitutionary gift took effect, and, G. never having had issue, her share of residue devolved on her personal representatives.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Frederick James Faulkland Rooke, deceased, (a) the trustees of the said will had power in their discretion to postpone the sale of the testator's house, farm lands and premises known as Woodhouse and to retain the same as an investment of the residuary estate of the testator so long as they should think fit so to do; (b) the share in the residuary estate of the testator to which the testator's sister, Gertrude Edith Rooke, would have been entitled if she had survived the testator's widow devolved subject to the life interest of the said widow (i) on the legal personal representatives of Gertrude Edith Rooke, or (ii) as on the intestacy of the testator, or (iii) in any and if so what other way.

H By his will, dated Oct. 8, 1948, the testator, Frederick James Faulkland Rooke, after appointing trustees and bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies and a specific legacy directed his trustees "if my house farm lands and premises known as Woodhouse . . . and my live and dead stock have not been sold at the time of my decease to as soon as possible after my death sell the same" and declared that after paying the costs of such sale "the net proceeds shall fall into and form part of my residuary estate". He devised his residuary estate to his trustees "upon trust to permit and allow my said wife to receive and enjoy the net income dividends and use thereof during her life" and on her death he gave his residuary estate to his trustees "to sell call in and convert the same into money and after paying the costs of such sale . . . to pay and divide the net proceeds with and equally between" his brother S. and his three sisters (whom he named, including the said Gertrude Edith Rooke). He further provided "in case of either of my brother or sisters shall be dead at the time of my wife's decease I give their respective share of my residuary estate to their respective issue and if more than one equally between them . . ." and he directed that "my trustees . . . may . . . have full power to sell or vary all or any part of my estate and may retain any investment that my estate may consist of at my death although the same may not be an investment allowed by law for the investment of trust funds . . ." There was no further disposition of the residuary estate. The testator died on Nov. 26, 1948. During his lifetime the testator had carried on a farming business at the property Woodhouse, which was his principal asset, and since his death his widow, one of the trustees of the will, had continued to carry on that business. The trustees had retained the said property in exercise of what they alleged to be their discretionary power of postponement, and the beneficiaries interested in the residue on the death of the widow claimed that the trustees were under a duty to carry out an immediate sale. The testator's sister, Gertrude Edith Rooke, died on Apr. 12, 1950, a spinster, predeceasing the testator's widow.

D. A. Ziegler for the plaintiff, one of the trustees of the will.

Winterbotham for the first and sixth defendants, the widow and another, both interested on intestacy.

C. G. Allen for the second, third, fourth and fifth defendants, the testator's brother, two sisters, and the personal representative of Gertrude Edith Rooke.

HARMAN, J.: The first question here is whether there is power to postpone the sale of a testator's main asset, a freehold farm. When he made his will, this farm in the Enborne Valley, Hampshire, was under the shadow of a scheme whereby the Metropolitan Water Board was to flood the land to make a reservoir for the sustenance of the citizens of London. That had had a very depressing effect on agricultural values in that district, and it seems to me quite clear that the testator at the time he made his will had been considering selling his farm. He made his will on Oct. 8, 1948, and his first bequests are certain small pecuniary legacies to employees

"in recognition of their loyal service to me, but I hereby declare that such last mentioned five legacies shall not be paid and shall be deemed to have lapsed in the event of the proposed scheme for a reservoir going through as I fear it will greatly depreciate the value of my property."

I should construe that so as to limit in some way the reference to that scheme going through, i.e., in his lifetime or before the legacies, which fall to be paid a year after his death, were due. The passage shows the state of his mind. He then went on in these words:

"I direct my trustees if my house farm lands and premises known as Woodhouse . . . and my live and dead stock have not been sold at the time of my decease to as soon as possible after my death sell the same and after paying the costs of such sale the net proceeds shall fall into and form part of my residuary estate."

That he gives to his trustees on trust to permit his wife to enjoy and receive the net income during her life.

There is no express gift of the farm to the wife or to anyone else. There is a direction to sell the farm as soon as possible and that the proceeds of sale—not the farm—shall fall into residue, which is given on trust to allow the widow to receive the income thereof. That means that she is to receive the income of the proceeds of sale of the farm only. The testator does not contemplate that she shall ever enjoy the farm as such in specie. On her death he gives, devises and bequeaths his residuary estate, i.e., the proceeds of sale of the farm and any other assets, on trust to sell and convert into money and to divide the net proceeds in certain shares. This latter trust for sale arises only on the death of the widow, and applies to whatever investments then represent the proceeds of sale of the farm and to whatever other assets there may have been retained during the widow's lifetime. The will continues:

"My trustees during my wife's lifetime may if they deem it advantageous have full power to sell or vary . . . any part of my estate "

—that must mean assets other than the farm—

"and may retain any investment that my estate may consist of at my death although the same may not be an investment allowed by law for the investment of trust funds . . ."

To make the will read consistently, "investment" there must mean investment in its strict sense. It cannot, in my judgment, mean the farm, because the power to retain that as an investment will not, in my judgment, read consistently with the direction to sell as soon as possible. It is said that, by virtue of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 25, even though the power to retain to which I have referred does not apply to the farm, yet a power to postpone sale has to be implied as a proviso to the trust for sale of the farm. It is pointed out that the section is mandatory

"A power to postpone sale shall, in the case of every trust for sale of land, be implied unless a contrary intention appears."

The crux of this case is whether a contrary intention appears in this will. I was referred to a case decided by SARGANT, J., Re Doherty-Waterhouse (1), where he cites the view of SIR WILLIAM PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., in Scriven v. Sandom (2). The case turned on the Wills Act, 1837, s. 27, where there are the words "unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." SARGANT, J., citing SIR WILLIAM PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., says ([1918] 2 Ch. 272):

"There is no contrary intention within the meaning of the statute, unless you find something in the will inconsistent with the view that the general devise was meant as an execution of the power."

Therefore, it is said here that there must be found in this will something inconsistent with the view that the statutory power of postponement was to be implied and that there is nothing inconsistent with that in a direction to sell at once.

Two further cases were cited, one a decision of NORTH, J., in Re Smith (3) where, in construing "a trust to sell with all convenient speed", the judge held that there was no discretion to postpone. That, however, was in 1896, before the passing of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 25. It has been argued that s. 25 has not altered the law, and that LUXMOORE, J., said so in Re Ball (4). The report of Re Ball (4) ([1930] W.N. 111) is a most imperfect one and another report (74 Sol. Jo. 289), though less inaccurate, is even briefer. That was a case where the property had vested absolutely and the trustees nevertheless alleged that they had a power to postpone sale although there was no unanimous request to them to postpone it made by the beneficiaries. The learned judge said that, under the old law, when all the shares were vested in this way a power to postpone lapsed and the law in that respect had not been altered by s. 25. With that everybody would agree, though not, perhaps, with the wider pronouncement as to the effect of s. 25 credited to the judge. It is clear that s. 25 did alter the law by causing a power to postpone to exist where none existed before.

I am, however, left with this question of construction: Is there here apparent a contrary intention? In my judgment, there is. The testator intended this farm to be sold at once if it had not been sold in his lifetime, and he did not intend that there should be any power in his trustees to postpone that sale. It seems to me that the words are sufficiently imperative to make them inconsistent with a discretionary power of postponement, and, therefore, adopting SIR WILLIAM PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.'s test on the true construction of the will there is here apparent an intention inconsistent with any power to postpone this sale. The trustees, in my judgment, have no right of general postponement, and, although they are not to be forced to sell in the next month or so, they must, as soon as it is proper from an administrative point of view, sell the property.

The second question which raises a point much incumbered with authority is whether the share of Gertrude Edith Rooke, being a vested share, remained vested in her, or whether it was divested by virtue of the fact that she died before the widow's decease, notwithstanding the fact that she had no issue to take under the gift over. That is a vexed question. Since Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5) the law has been as laid down in the judgment of the court by PARKE, B., in these terms (5 C.B. 746):

"If a testator were to devise to A.B. in fee, and to direct, that, in the event of A.B. dying in the lifetime of J.S., the estate should go over to a charity, it surely is perfectly clear, that, if A.B. died in the lifetime of J.S., he, A.B., or, rather, his heirs, would lose the estate. The testator could not give to the charity, without taking away from the devisee. The testator, therefore, in such a case, by his will says: 'If A.B. dies in the lifetime of J.S., I do not mean that A.B. or his heirs should any longer have the estate.' The estate of A.B. is in such case defeated, not by the giving over of the estate to the charity, but by the happening of the event on which the testator intended it should go over. So, in the case before us: the testatrix (for, for this purpose, she may be treated as an ordinary testatrix,) says, in substance: 'If my son John and his brother William die in their father's lifetime, I do not mean him (John) to have the property; but I give it over to strangers.' That which defeats the estate of John is, the death of himself and brother in his father's lifetime,—not the giving over of the estate to strangers. The reason why John's representatives cannot claim the property is, that his mother expressly declared, that, in the event which happened, he should not have it."

That is a very clear statement of what the law ordinarily is, and it has been followed ever since, albeit, with a good deal of reluctance. It will not, however, be followed if, on the true reading of the will, the gift over was intended only to operate in favour of some person who could take under it; and, indeed, the cases in line with Lassence v. Tierney (6) and Hancock v. Watson (7) have long told us that where there is a vested gift, it will not be divested in the ordinary way except in favour of persons existing to take under the gift over. So I should have thought that in the ordinary way, where there was a gift to A with a proviso that if he die before a life tenant it should go over to some class of remaindermen, the intention was to take A's gift away only if there were remaindermen to take. However, that is the law only in exceptional cases.

In Robinson v. Wood (8) SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., rather reluctantly held himself bound by Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5). In a more modern case, Re Bold (9), LAWRENCE, J., held that he must apply Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5). In that case, a moiety of the trust fund was given to the testatrix's brother "provided always that if my said brother Ernest Hartland shall die without leaving any issue living at his death the last mentioned moiety of the said trust funds shall be held in trust for the said John D'Urban Scott if he shall attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age."

J. D. Scott did not attain twenty-one or marry under that age; it was held that, nevertheless, the gift went over on the death without issue of Ernest. LAWRENCE, J., after discussing Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5), says (95 L.J.Ch. 203):

A "The sole contingency upon which the interest of Ernest Hartland is to be divested is the event of his dying without leaving issue living at his death. In that event his interest, in my judgment, on the construction of this will, is divested; and, inasmuch as the gift over has failed, there will be an intestacy as to the second moiety as well as to the first moiety."

The rule which is said to be applicable in this case is stated in THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., p. 454, in these perfectly general terms:

"A vested interest, which is given over in certain events, is divested if those events happen, though the gift over may be void . . ."

B There is an admitted exception in cases of perpetuity discussed by COHEN, J., in Re Pratt's Settlement Trusts (10) to which I need not further refer. In JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., p. 1445—and in this it is not inconsistent with the older editions—I find this passage:

C "We have already discussed the rule that, where an estate is devised on a contingency in partial derogation of a preceding estate in fee, the original devise is only affected to the extent necessary for the introduction of the contingent estate."

That would suit this case and would suit the interests of Gertrude Edith Rooke. The learned editor goes on in these words (p. 1446):

D "But it would appear to be clearly settled that the principle of Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5) applies to personalty as well as realty, so that where there is an absolute gift, followed by a gift over on the happening of a certain event, the prior gift is defeated on the happening of the event, although the gift over fails."

Then he refers to O'Mahoney v. Burdett (11) and continues:

E "But the principle does not apply in those cases 'in which it is plain that the original gift was not intended to be defeated unless there [are] objects to take under the gift over, as for instance in cases of substitutionary gifts to children.'"

F That last citation is taken from the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Hurst v. Hurst (12), which bore on subject-matter very foreign to this, except that it was necessary to construe the will in order to see whether there was forfeiture in that case. After using the words just quoted, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., continued (21 Ch.D. 293):

G "... but here we have an intention separately declared that the gift is to be forfeited . . . If the forfeiture is expressly limited to take effect on the event mentioned in the first branch of the clause effect must be given to it, though there be nothing to be accelerated under the second branch . . ."

H Then he considered Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5), Robinson v. Wood (8) and O'Mahoney v. Burdett (11), and came to the conclusion that there was in that case a forfeiture. But what about the exception? Is he not suggesting that, where the only gift over is a gift over in favour of the children or issue, that is a sufficient indication to the court that the gift is intended to be defeated only in favour of issue, and, if there are no children or issue, then the gift is not defeated. It is not quite like Salisbury v. Petty (13), cited to me by counsel, where the gift was merely to A or B, because there it is clear that the testator intended that either A or B should take and B only if A were not alive. In that case there was a complicated will, whereby charges were levied on the estate in favour of remaindermen according to who took the fee simple. SIR JAMES WIGRAM, V.-C., had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the charges were meant to arise whether the original taker or his issue existed to take the fee simple, and, therefore, if there were no issue, then the original taker would take. There are other cases in which gifts to issue have been treated as purely substitutionary. Smither v. Willock (14) is a clear decision. The substitution there was to the children of the first taker (9 Ves. 233):

"The Master of the Rolls declared the share of the deceased brother to be vested, subject to be divested [sic] only in the event of his death in the life of the testator's widow, leaving children; and consequently, that event not having happened, his representative was entitled."

That case is stated to be the law in JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., p. 1446.

What, then, am I to conclude? I find no case where, there being a substitutionary gift in favour of children (which is the case here as this is a mere substitutionary gift introduced by the words of contingency "in case"), the divesting has been held to be anything but a partial divesting operative to the extent necessary to let in the remaindermen. It seems to me that the natural way to construe this will is to say that the testator intended his brothers and sisters to be defeated only if they died in his widow's lifetime leaving children, or, at any rate, having had children. It is said that the authority of Doe d. Blomfield v. Eyre (5) defeats that view, but, in my judgment, I am at liberty in cases where substitution is in favour of children, to follow the words of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Hurst v. Hurst (12) (21 Ch.D. 293) where he said that the principle did not apply in cases where it was plain that the substitution was meant to operate only in favour of a certain class, as in substitutionary gifts to children or issue. This is such a substitutionary gift. In my judgment, the gift over was intended to operate only if there was some person to take under it. There being no such person, the right given to the testator's sister which vested in her at his death has not been divested because she had no child. I shall, therefore, declare that it devolves on the personal representative of Gertrude Edith Rooke.

Declarations accordingly.

GATEHOUSE v. JOHN SUMMERS & SONS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 4, 5, 1953.]

Factory—Lifting machine—“Parts and working gear”—Good construction—Travelling crane with magnet—Defective cable conveying current to magnet—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 24 (1).

A Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Electricity—Electrical joint—“Proper construction as regards . . . mechanical strength”—Cable supplying electricity to magnet of crane—Duty to make safe for electrician pulling on cable—Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312), reg. 6.

B An electrical cable conveyed current to a travelling crane at the defendants' works to electrify its magnet. While an electrician employed by the defendants was pulling at the cable in order to free it after it had jammed a defective joint in it broke and the electrician fell and was killed.

HELD: (i) the cable was not one of the “parts and working gear . . . of . . . [a] lifting machine” within the meaning of s. 24 (1) of the C Factories Act, 1937, but was a mere electrical lead, and the defendants were, therefore, not in breach of a duty to ensure that it was “of good construction” under that sub-section.

(ii) the provision in the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907, reg. 6, that an electrical joint should
D be “of proper construction as regards . . . mechanical strength” covered strength necessary to resist such pull as the electrician would be likely to exert to free the cable if the need arose, as distinct from the strength necessary safely to carry electrical current, and the defendants were, therefore, liable for breach of the regulation.

H APPEAL by the defendants and CROSS-APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PEARSON, J., dated Dec. 5, 1952, and made at Chester Assizes, awarding damages to the plaintiff in an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was the administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, an electrician employed by the defendants, who was killed as a result of an accident due to a defective joint in a cable conveying electric current to the magnet of a travelling crane at the defendants' works. She claimed damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, (i) for negligence at common law in that the defendants failed to provide proper or suitable plant for the deceased or to provide a proper and safe system of working, and (ii) for breach of statutory duty on the ground that the cable was one of the parts and working gear of a lifting machine within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 24 (1), and was not of good construction as required by that enactment, and that the electrical joint of the cable was not of proper construction as regards mechanical strength as required by the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312), reg. 6. The defendants denied negligence and contended that the cable was not one of the parts and working gear of a lifting machine within the meaning of s. 24 (1) and that the accident was not a danger against which it was one of the purposes of reg. 6 to provide. PEARSON, J., held the defendants not liable at common law, but liable for breach of their duty under both the Act of 1937 and the regulation.

*H. Edmund Davies, Q.C., and Mars-Jones for the defendants.
Beney, Q.C., and F. Elwyn Jones, Q.C., for the plaintiff.*

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal from an order of PEARSON, J., who awarded damages to the plaintiff as the administratrix of her husband who was killed while carrying out an operation at the works of the defendants. The learned judge assessed the damages at more than £4,000, but deducted twenty-five per cent. because he held that the deceased had to some extent brought about the accident by his own negligence.

The deceased was an electrician who had been employed by the defendants for some time. At their works the defendants have a moveable crane which travels up and down on a gantry on rails, and lifts scrap steel by means of a powerful magnet weighing many tons. The magnet has to be kept electrified, and, accordingly, independently of the machinery which hauls up the magnet once it has attracted the metal, it has an electric cable, wound on a separate drum, bringing it electric current. The gantry, being near the sea, is at times exposed to considerable wind pressure, and in a high wind from time to time the cable gets blown off the drum, generally to the side nearest to the cat-walk or gangway along which electricians or other workmen can walk, but also, more rarely, on the opposite side. On the occasion in question the cable had been blown off on the far side from the gangway. The cable jammed, and, as the crane man could not by manipulation release the jamming and make the drum work again, the deceased was called up the ladder. He ascended and stood with one foot on the rail on which the crane ran and the other on the pedestal part of the crane. That was a dangerous position, because he was directly over a space. He pulled with both hands on the electrical cable, hoping to release it and get it back on to the drum. Unfortunately, the cable had a defective joint which broke, and he fell some twenty-six feet on to the scrap metal below and was killed. This cable was of substantial construction, and, according to the evidence, it ought to have borne the strain of eight men. It broke because it had not been jointed properly. The evidence of the expert witnesses of both the plaintiff and the defendants was that, properly jointed, it would have been as strong as a new cable.

The action was framed on two grounds. First, it was said that the defendants were negligent at common law in not providing the deceased man with proper plant, which it was their duty to provide for the safe working of their men. Secondly, it was said that the defendants had committed breaches of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 24 (1), and also of the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907, reg. 6.

The deceased was entitled to assume that, if he pulled on this thick cable, whether with one hand or two, it would withstand his weight. This court has come to the conclusion that there was a defect in the plant which ought not to have existed, and, it being the duty of the defendants to supply their men with proper plant, that the learned judge ought to have found that there was a breach of their common law duty. The judge did not find that the method of righting the cable employed by the deceased was a wholly improper method, but this court does not see any ground on which to differ from his finding that the deceased contributed to his own misfortune to the extent of twenty-five per cent.

That is enough to dispose of the case, but I think there was also a breach of statutory duty, though not a breach of s. 24 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, which deals with lifting machinery, because the cable that broke was no part of the lifting machinery. It was a mere electrical lead. It had nothing to do with the winding up or raising of the magnet. It simply electrified the magnet.

I think it would be wrong, therefore, to say—and I respectfully differ from the learned judge on this point—that it was part of the lifting working gear of the crane.

The electricity regulations made under the Factories Acts, however, show their object by the preamble:

“Whereas the generation, transformation, distribution and use of electrical energy in any factory or workshop or any place to which the provisions of s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, are applied by that Act have been certified in pursuance of the said section to be dangerous”, the following regulations are made. “Danger” is defined in these regulations as meaning “... danger to health or danger to life or limb from shock, burn, or other injury to persons employed, or from fire attendant upon the generation, transformation, distribution, or use of electrical energy.”

I think, therefore, that counsel for the defendants is justified in saying that the main object of these regulations is to protect the workmen from what may be called electrical injury. By contrast with several of the regulations the word “danger” does not appear in reg. 6, which provides:

“Every electrical joint and connection shall be of proper construction as regards conductivity, insulation, mechanical strength and protection.”

It is clear that an electrical installation including dynamos, converters, engines and so forth, will include cables and, perhaps, pylons and other things used for the transmission of electricity. The wording of the regulation is clear and is not limited in any way. Therefore, although electric current may not at the moment be passing through the cables, as it would not be if workmen were working on them, an electrician will, nevertheless, be entitled to assume that those electric cables are safe and that the joints are of proper construction and sound as regards mechanical strength and protection. If he feels it necessary to haul on the cable or put weight on it, whether to draw it through a conduit or for any other purpose, he is entitled to assume that the regulations have been carried out, and that the electrical joint has been so constructed as to provide adequate mechanical strength and protection. This one was not, and it does not seem to me to matter whether the injury which the deceased man received was an electric burn or shock or some other form of injury, provided it resulted from the defect in the electrical joint and was, therefore, caused by a breach of reg. 6.

We were pressed with the decision in Gorris v. Scott (1), in which it was held that where regulations or statutory provisions are made for one object and the damage complained of is divorced from the purpose for which those regulations were made, there is no cause of action. The regulations there were made under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, s. 75, and provided that in ships the animals should be separately and properly penned. The animals in question were not properly or securely penned in the ship, and they were lost, not by reason of any contagious disease, but by the perils of the sea, being washed overboard. It was claimed that the statutory provisions for the prevention of contagious diseases had been broken—and that any damage which resulted from that default could form a cause of action. The court held that the regulations had nothing to do with the perils of the sea or with precautions against the animals being washed overboard. They were simply provisions against contagious diseases. In Carroll v. Barclay (Andrew) & Sons, Ltd. (2) the House of Lords held that failure to comply with an enactment requiring machinery to be fenced in order to prevent workmen putting their hands into the machines did not give rise to a cause of action where, in the absence of a fence, a piece of machinery flew out and killed a man standing near. That was because the object of the Act was, not to prevent a piece of machinery flying out, but to prevent the workmen from coming into contact with the moving machine.

I do not think that that applies here. The statutory requirement is that the electrical joints shall be perfect, or as near perfect as they can be made by ordinary care and skill. They are to be of proper construction as regards mechanical strength. This one was not of proper construction as regards mechanical strength, and an electrician who was working on it, and was, therefore, one of the persons whom these regulations are designed to protect, was injured thereby. Whether he was injured in one form or another seems to me to be immaterial. He was injured by reason of the defect in the mechanical construction of this electrical joint, and, therefore, I think the defendants are liable. While we differ from the learned judge in thinking that there was here a breach of common law duty as well as the breach of statutory duty, we uphold his judgment for the plaintiff and we see no reason to differ from him in the assessment of the relative responsibilities of the parties.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. In the case as originally pleaded by counsel for the plaintiff he relied on three main matters. There was first a claim at common law for negligence against the defendants in that they failed to provide proper or suitable plant for the deceased workman. Four matters were set out in the pleadings to support that contention, the third being:

“The said cable was not of adequate or normal mechanical strength being weakened at the point at which it was jointed at which it broke as aforesaid.”

There was a clear allegation of the non-provision of proper and suitable plant in that particular respect. Secondly, it was said that the defendants “failed to provide a proper and/or safe system of working”, which is almost a commonplace in every case of this kind in the courts. The other two matters relied on were breaches of statutory duty, one being under s. 24 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the other under reg. 6 of the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907. The learned judge, after giving careful attention to the facts of the case and to the arguments addressed to him, said:

“There was, therefore, a breach of statutory duty under s. 24 (1) and also under reg. 6 . . . Other points were covered by the pleading and the argument on behalf of the plaintiff, but I was not satisfied that the plaintiff's case was made out on any ground other than the breaches of statutory duty which I have mentioned.”

That paragraph occasioned me considerable surprise, and I can only think that, as the allegation with regard to the plant had at least four branches, the third one was in some degree overlooked, because the mere finding of a breach of

reg. 6 on the grounds on which it was found seems to me to cover entirely the point counsel for the plaintiff pleaded in para. 8 (a) (iii). PEARSON, J., found that the "main cause" of this accident was the breaking of the cable at the faulty electrical joint. It was attempted to make s. 24 (1) of the Act relevant to this case under the provision that on the ground that the cable was a part and also working gear, and the learned judge so found. I agree with what my Lord has already said, and I differ from the finding of the learned judge, about that. I think that on the facts s. 24 (1) has no application here.

As regards reg. 6, the defendants said that, if their whole purport is looked at, these regulations deal with the danger arising from the use of electricity, and on the facts of this case this accident was not in any sense concerned with electricity. Much reliance was placed on the definition of danger contained in the regulations. The material words in reg. 6,

"Every electrical joint . . . shall be of proper construction as regards . . . mechanical strength . . .", have no reference to any danger immediate or to be apprehended. They cast a duty on the employers with which they must comply. If that is the proper construction to be put on them, there is nothing more to be said, for the learned judge found that the main cause of the accident was that the electrical joint was not of the construction and mechanical strength laid down by the regulation. I think, therefore, that reg. 6 is applicable in this case, though s. 24 (1) of the Act of 1937 is not.

I also entirely agree with what my Lord said about the liability at common law. In my view, the finding of the learned judge on that matter is conclusive. The question of the deceased's own liability, which the judge assessed at twenty-five per cent. is not an easy one. It can be said that he was entitled to act in almost any way he pleased, relying on the fact that the cable would be of sound construction and would not break, but I think the better view is that regard must be had to the evidence. Mr. Gardner, who was called for the plaintiff, answered the first question put to him in cross-examination in this way:

"Mr. Gardner, there is no doubt about it that Mr. Gatehouse unfortunately chose, from the safety point of view, the worst possible method, did he not? (A) Yes."

In all the circumstances I think the learned judge came to a right conclusion on that matter.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree. The learned judge found that the defendants were in breach of reg. 6 of the electricity regulations made under the Factories Acts, but not in breach of their common law liability. The plaintiff having relied in her pleading on the inadequate strength of the cable as part of the working gear with which the deceased man was provided, it seems to me that the finding of inadequate strength with the finding that this was the primary cause of the accident carries with it necessarily the common law liability of the defendants. The learned judge approached the case, I think, on the basis that the common law attack was really made on the lines that there was no proper system of work, in that no satisfactory platform was provided for the deceased man, and, having found against the plaintiff on that, he dismissed that part of the claim and concentrated on the breach of the statutory regulations, and under that head he dealt with the question of liability. For the reasons which my Lords have given, I agree that the two matters overlap.

Not only are the defendants liable at common law, but they are also liable under reg. 6, which provides:

“Every electrical joint and connection shall be of proper construction as regards conductivity, insulation, mechanical strength and protection.”

Having regard to the use of the word “conductivity”, it is difficult to give any useful meaning to the words “mechanical strength” unless one treats them as covering strength apart from the strength necessary to carry electric current, in other words, the strength necessary to resist such pull as a workman may be likely to want to exert in carrying out such a task as freeing a jammed cable. I agree also that, although the regulations apply, s. 24 (1) of the Act dealing with cranes and lifting machines does not apply, because I cannot hold that this cable, which was nothing more than a lead bringing electricity to the magnet and had nothing to do with the crane as a lifting machine, comes within the language of s. 24 (1):

“All parts and working gear . . . shall be of good construction, sound material . . . adequate strength . . .”

This was not part of the lifting machinery at all, and I agree that s. 24 (1) does not apply.

With regard to the appeal on contributory negligence, I notice that the learned judge directed himself by Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (3), where LORD WRIGHT ([1939] 3 All E.R. 736) drew attention to some earlier words of LAWRENCE, J., in Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel Iron & Coal Co. (4), pointing out that, where a workman is concentrating on his job in the circumstances of factory life, the courts will not be ready lightly to find him guilty of contributory negligence so as to prevent his recovering from his employers. Having directed himself in that way, the learned judge felt bound, I think rightly, to find that a proportion of the blame must be attributed to this man. The main ground on which he based his decision was that, instead of holding on with one hand and pulling with the other, while standing in this precarious position more than twenty feet above the ground, he let go with both hands, and applied both hands to the cable to free the jam. It is obvious that, as the expert said, it was an exceedingly dangerous operation. Whether the cable broke or whether the jam freed itself suddenly, the risk that the man was running was a very great one. I agree, therefore, with the finding of the learned judge on that aspect of the case.

Appeal dismissed: cross appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. NICHOLSON AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), April 30, May 1, 1953.]

Income Tax—Settlement—Income of settlor—Settlement revocable after seven years—Cesser of liability to make annual payments—Further deed postponing operation of power of revocation for further three years—Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 38 (1).

By a deed dated Mar. 27, 1943, a settlor constituted a trust for objects which were exclusively charitable and covenanted with the trustees that so long as she lived she would pay to the trustees the monthly sum of £350 without any deduction except for income tax, such sum to accrue as from Apr. 6, 1942, and to be paid on the last day of every month. The deed further provided that "the settlor shall have power exercisable by deed at any time or times after the expiration of seven years from the date hereof to revoke wholly or partially the foregoing covenant". On Feb. 28, 1950, the settlor executed a deed supplemental to the deed of 1943 by which she provided that, notwithstanding anything in the deed of 1943 to the contrary, the power of revocation thereof should not be exercisable by her until after Mar. 27, 1953, and, so far only as was necessary to give full effect to that provision, she released her said power of revocation. Up to and including the payment made on Feb. 28, 1950, the trustees recovered the tax paid by the settlor under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37. An application by the trustees for repayment of tax paid in respect of payments made under the deed of covenant on and after Mar. 31, 1950, was rejected.

HELD: if for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38 (1), the "settlement" comprised only the deed of 1943, the power to revoke was not suspended on and after Mar. 28, 1950; and if the "settlement" were the deed of 1943 coupled with the deed of 1950, the first payment thereunder fell due on Mar. 31, 1950, and the power of revocation would be exercisable in 1953, within six years of the first payment due under the compound settlement; and, therefore, the proviso to s. 38 (1) was not satisfied and the monthly sums were "income of the settlor" within that sub-section and not of the trustees of the charity, and no tax was repayable.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

H

The trustees of a charity known as the Frank Butler Memorial Fund applied under the Finance Act, 1925, s. 19 (2), to have a claim for exemption from income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37, heard and determined by the Special Commissioners, the claim having been refused by the Inland Revenue Commissioners. By a deed dated Mar. 27, 1943, a settlor executed a declaration of trust in favour of herself and another as trustees with the intention of setting up a charitable trust, the Frank Butler Memorial Fund. By the said deed, the settlor covenanted to pay so long as she lived monthly sums to the trustees after deduction of tax therefrom to be held on the trusts thereof, and provided that after the expiration of seven years from the date hereof to revoke wholly or partially the foregoing covenant."

"the settlor shall have power exercisable by deed at any time or times

By a further deed dated Feb. 28, 1950, the settlor, in effect, postponed the operation of the power of revocation for a further three years. The Inland Revenue Commissioners refused the claim of the trustees that the payments made to them on and after Mar. 31, 1950, under the deed of covenant were, as the income of a charity, exempt from tax, and that the tax paid by the settlor was, therefore, repayable to them. The Special Commissioners allowed the appeal of the trustees. The Crown appealed against their decision.

UPJOHN, J.: This appeal by the Inland Revenue Commissioners against a decision of the Special Commissioners raises a point on the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, which section has given rise to the execution by many persons of documents frequently referred to among lawyers as "seven-year covenants".

Section 38 (1) provides:

"If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof and, in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may cease to be liable to make any annual payments payable by virtue or in consequence of any provision of the settlement; . . . any sums payable by the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor by virtue or in consequence of that provision of the settlement in any year of assessment shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person. Provided that, where any such power as is referred to in para. (a) of this sub-section cannot be exercised within the period of six years from the time when the first of the annual payments so referred to becomes payable, and the like annual payments are payable in each year throughout that period, the said para. (a) shall not apply so long as the said power cannot be exercised."

Section 41 (4) (b) of the same Act defines the word "settlement":

"The expression 'settlement' includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement, and the expression 'settlor' in relation to a settlement means any person by whom the settlement was made."

In this case, by a deed dated Mar. 27, 1943, Patience Nicholson, who is defined as the settlor, executed a declaration of trust in favour of herself and one Bartlett as trustees (they being the respondents) with the intention of setting up a charitable trust to be known as the "Frank Butler Memorial Fund". That memorial fund is, undoubtedly, a fund formed for exclusively charitable objects. That is not in dispute. By cl. 3 of the deed the settlor covenanted in these terms:

"The settlor hereby covenants with the trustees that so long as the settlor lives she the settlor will pay to the trustees the monthly sum of £350 without any deduction except for income tax such sum to accrue as from Apr. 6, 1942, and to be paid as to the amount thereof accrued down to the date hereof on the execution of these presents and as to the sums hereafter to accrue on the last day of every month . . . Provided always that the settlor shall have power exercisable by deed at any time or times after the expiration of seven years from the date hereof to revoke wholly or partially the foregoing covenant."

No difficulty arises down to and including the last payment before the power of revocation became exercisable, i.e., the payment due on Feb. 28, 1950. Down to that date inclusive the settlor deducted tax from the payments, and the respondents, as charitable trustees, were able to recover payments of that tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37. However, shortly before the power of revocation became exercisable on Mar. 28, 1950, i.e., on Feb. 28, 1950, the settlor executed a supplemental deed to the declaration of trust of Mar. 27, 1943, which made provision in these terms:

"Notwithstanding anything in the said declaration of trust to the contrary the power of revocation given to the settlor by the said declaration of trust shall not be exercisable by her until after the expiration of Mar. 27, 1953, and (so far only as may be necessary to give full effect to the terms of this declaration hereinbefore contained) the settlor hereby in exercise of every statutory or other power enabling her in this behalf releases this said power of revocation to this intent that the same shall not be exercisable except as aforesaid."

In other words, the operation of the power of revocation was postponed for a further three years.

The question arises whether, in respect of payments falling due on and after Mar. 31, 1950, the income, having regard to s. 38 (1), is to be deemed to be the income of the settlor, or whether it is to remain the income of the charity trustees. The Special Commissioners took the latter view.

The construction of this section is not without authority. It was considered in Taylor v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). The facts there were a little complicated, but in effect what happened was this. By a deed dated Dec. 30, 1939, the settlor covenanted to pay certain sums additional to those which he was already under covenant to pay by virtue of two earlier deeds. The covenant contained in that deed was revocable at any time after 1942. Therefore, there was the distinction between Taylor's case (1) and the present case that the deed of 1939 never satisfied the provisions of s. 38 (1), whereas, undoubtedly, the original deed before me did so. Then, in 1940, the period of irrevocability, if I may so call it, was extended by a deed dated Apr. 1, 1940, to a period which failed, owing obviously to a slip, to exceed six years from Apr. 1, 1940, by some three weeks. There is no doubt that the commissioners, and, I think, MACNAGHTEN, J., proceeded on the footing that the relevant settlement was the deed of Dec. 30, 1939, and that settlement did not include the subsequent deed of Apr. 1, 1940.

A different view, however, was taken in the Court of Appeal, where COHEN, L.J., delivered the leading judgment, a judgment with which LORD GREENE, M.R., and SOMERVELL, L.J., concurred. The argument before them proceeded on the footing that the deeds of December, 1939, and of Apr. 1, 1940, constituted one settlement, and, as the power of revocation in that settlement was exercisable within six years of the date of the first payment under that compound settlement, the proviso to s. 38 (1) was not satisfied. COHEN, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said (27 Tax Cas. 101):

"Having regard to the references in the proviso back to the earlier part of the sub-section, and to the use of the present tense, the proviso must, in my opinion, be construed to read as follows: 'Provided that, where any power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement contained in such settlement cannot under any provision of such settlement be exercised within the period of six years from the time when the first of the annual payments due under such settlement becomes payable, the said para. (a) shall not apply so long as the said power cannot be exercised'. It is plain that the power to revoke and the obligation to pay must be contained in the same settlement, and the use of the present tense, in my opinion, involves that the restriction on the exercise of the power to revoke should also be present in the same settlement. Having regard to the definition of 'settlement' in s. 41, the settlement may be a single document or may be comprised in two or more documents, but it must be the same settlement throughout."

That is a very valuable guide to me on the principles to be applied in construing the section, and, in particular, the proviso. Indeed, it seems to me that that part of the judgment which I have just read is binding on me.

I say no more about the decision of the Special Commissioners in this case other than that they appear wholly to have misapprehended the effect of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Taylor's case (1). In my judgment, what was said by COHEN, L.J., is quite plain. There must be found in the settlement, whether it be constituted in one document or in two or more documents so as to form a compound settlement, three things. There must be, first, an obligation to pay, secondly, a power to revoke, and, thirdly, a suspension of that power to revoke for six years from the first payment. It seems to me clear that the learned lord justice when he used the words "so long as the said power cannot be exercised" intended to refer to a minimum period of six years, and it is not sufficient merely to be able to point to a restriction during the relevant year of assessment. That seems to me clear from the next sentence in the passage I have read. If that be true, then it must be clear that the claim of the Crown here succeeds.

If the only settlement is the settlement of 1943, then for the relevant period the power to revoke is no longer suspended. If the relevant settlement be the settlement of 1943, coupled with the deed of 1950, then the first payment thereunder fell due on Mar. 31, 1950. Again, the proviso was not satisfied because the power of revocation comes into operation in 1953, within six years of the first payment due under the compound settlement.

Counsel for the taxpayers has reserved the right to challenge the passage I have read in the judgment of COHEN, L.J., because he submits that it is wrong and not in accordance with the true construction of the proviso to say that the suspension of the power to revoke must be in the same settlement as the power of revocation, but he admitted that he could not argue that before me. He submitted also that, even if the learned lord justice was right, it was sufficient to show that the original restriction was for six years and to point to an existing restriction during the relevant year of assessment. That is a matter that I have already dealt with in my judgment. Accordingly, the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

PACKER v. PACKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Morris, L.JJ.), March 9, May 11, 1953.]

Divorce—Custody—Child born before marriage—Not legitimated per subsequens matrimonium—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 26 (1).

Infant—Maintenance—Infant born before marriage—Not legitimated per subsequens matrimonium—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 26 (1).

A On Feb. 9, 1944, a child was born out of wedlock at a time when the father (the husband in the present proceedings) was married to another woman. In July, 1945, the father's marriage was dissolved, and on July 28, 1945, he married the mother of the child, the wife in the present proceedings. On Aug. 7, 1951, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of her marriage with the husband on the ground of his desertion. On Nov. 22, 1951, she obtained a decree nisi, which was made absolute on Jan. 9, 1952. On applications by the wife in the divorce proceedings under s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for provision with respect to the custody and maintenance of the child,

B HELD (per DENNING, L.J.): the test of jurisdiction under s. 26 (1) was the parenthood and not the legitimacy of the child, and, therefore, the court could make the provision sought by the wife.

C Per MORRIS, L.J.: the expression "the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings" in s. 26 (1) referred to the children of a "marriage" union, including a case where the "marriage" was declared to be null and void, but it did not include a child born out of wedlock in circumstances which, in view of the provisions of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1 (2), prevented his being legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents, and, accordingly, on the dissolution of the wife's marriage, no order for the custody or maintenance of the child could be made under s. 26 (1).

H INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS by the wife against two orders of His Honour JUDGE RICHARDSON, sitting as special commissioner in divorce, dated Dec. 12, 1952, whereby he dismissed the wife's applications for custody and maintenance of a child, Ian Kenneth.

On Feb. 9, 1944, the wife, then a single woman, gave birth to the child of which the husband, at that time married to another woman, was the father. In July, 1945, the husband's marriage was dissolved, and on July 28, 1945, he married the wife. On Aug. 7, 1951, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's desertion and prayed for orders for the custody and maintenance of the child. On Nov. 22, 1951, the wife was granted a decree nisi on her petition, and she then amended the petition by deleting the prayer for custody of the child. On Jan. 9, 1952, the decree nisi was made absolute. On Sept. 11, 1952, the registrar made an order for maintenance in favour of the wife at the rate of 7s. per week. On Oct. 28, 1952, the wife's application to the special commissioner in chambers for a variation of that order was dismissed. Later, the wife applied under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 26 (1), and r. 54 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, for orders for the custody and maintenance of the child. On Dec. 12, 1952, these applications were dismissed by the special commissioner in chambers, and the wife now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: In 1943 the husband, then a married man, had sexual intercourse with a woman who was not his wife, as a result of which a child was born to her on Feb. 9, 1944. In July, 1945, a decree absolute was made dissolving his marriage to his first wife, and on July 28, 1945, he married the woman who had borne his child. In October, 1947, he deserted his second wife, and on Aug. 7, 1951, she brought divorce proceedings against him on the ground of his desertion. On Jan. 9, 1952, a decree absolute was made dissolving that marriage. On Mar. 29, 1952, he married his third wife. In December, 1952, the second wife applied in her divorce proceedings for custody and maintenance of the child, but, on the authority of Harrison v. Harrison (1), the commissioner held that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application. The second wife now appeals to this court with the avowed intention of challenging the authority of Harrison v. Harrison (1). Both parties have been granted legal aid so as to enable an authoritative ruling to be obtained. On this account I will refrain from going further into the details of the case, but will consider simply the point of jurisdiction.

The matter depends on s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which repeats a series of sections in substantially the same form ever since s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857:

"In any proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage or judicial separation, the court may from time to time, either before or by or after the final decree, make such provision as appears just with respect to the custody, maintenance and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings . . ."

According to Harrison v. Harrison (1) the word "children" in that section does not apply to illegitimate children, but applies only to legitimate children, that is, to children of the petitioner and the respondent born in lawful wedlock or legitimated by subsequent marriage. The child in the present case was born illegitimate, and it was not legitimised by the subsequent marriage of its parents because the father was married to a third person when it was born: see the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 1 (2).

I see no reason for confining the section to legitimate children. On the contrary there are strong reasons why it must extend to illegitimate children as well as legitimate children. That is shown by the fact that the section applies not only to proceedings for divorce but also to proceedings for nullity. It applies, for instance, to nullity on the ground of affinity, bigamy or want of form, and the court can make provision for the children of incestuous or bigamous or invalid marriages, although those children are clearly illegitimate: see Langworthy v. Langworthy (2).

Once the word "children" in the section is interpreted so as to include illegitimate children (as it must be), then the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court to make provision under s. 26 (1) depends on three requisites being fulfilled: (i) the application must be made in "proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage or judicial separation", and (ii) the application must relate to "children", legitimate or illegitimate, and (iii) "the marriage of the parents" of those children must be "the subject of the proceedings". When the section is analysed in that way it is clear that the test of jurisdiction is parenthood, not legitimacy. Counsel for the husband conceded that in proceedings for nullity the test was parenthood, but he argued that in proceedings for divorce or judicial separation the test was legitimacy. I cannot see the slightest justification for that dichotomy. There is nothing in the wording of the section to support it. If the matter was tested by an attempt to write out the section in full with that dichotomy inserted into it, you would soon give up the attempt and insist on dividing the section itself into distinct parts, one part dealing with proceedings for divorce or judicial separation, the other part dealing with proceedings for nullity. It is, moreover, worth noticing that in s. 26 (2), which deals with restitution of conjugal rights, the words used are not "children of the marriage" which is the accepted way of denoting legitimate children, but "children of the petitioner and respondent" which are apt to make parenthood the test in that case also. On the strict construction of the section, therefore, I am of opinion that the Divorce Court has jurisdiction to make provision for an illegitimate child of the parties, provided that they are its parents.

I am not inclined, however, to stand out for a strict construction of an Act of Parliament if reason and good sense point to a different construction. But in this case reason and good sense go hand in hand with the strict construction. Counsel for the husband concedes that the Chancery Division (or the county court or the court of summary jurisdiction) can make provision under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, with regard to illegitimate children. All he says is that the Divorce Court cannot do it. Just see what this means. Take the familiar case where a single woman lives with a married man and has a child by him. He afterwards gets a divorce from his previous wife and marries the single woman and they have three more children. The Divorce Court has full jurisdiction in respect of the three children born after marriage, but none, it is said, over the child which was born to them before marriage. The parties have to go to the Chancery Division to deal with that child. What a waste of money this is. That one child could well have been provided for by the Divorce Court at the same time as the other three, and, indeed, better provided for, because the divorce judge will have seen the parties and will know all about them. Yet it is said that the parties must go to the expense of separate Chancery proceedings, and instruct a Chancery judge by fresh affidavits, and get his order about this one child while the divorce judge is dealing with the other three. Surely the sensible and the practical thing is for the judge who tries the divorce case to make provision at one and the same time for all the four children of the parties, as well for the illegitimate one as for the three legitimate ones. The wording of the Act of Parliament permits the divorce judge to do this, and I do not think that we should stand in the way of it.

What is the argument on the other side? Only this, that no case has been found in which it has been done before. That argument does not appeal to me in the least. If we never do anything which has not been done before, we shall never get anywhere. The law will stand still while the rest of the world goes on, and that will be bad for both. There is no decision of this court that an order cannot be made for custody of an illegitimate child, and, in the absence of direct decision preventing us, I think we should follow the course which is permitted by statute and prescribed by good sense. I realise that there is a dictum of the Divisional Court in 1948 in C. v. C. (3) and a rule of court, first made in 1950, (r. 54 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940)) which assume that s. 26 is confined to legitimate children, but the present case is brought to test the validity of this assumption. If it is shown to be wrong, we should not hesitate to say so.

There was one point made by counsel for the husband, however, which deserves to be mentioned. It is best shown by an illustration. Suppose that a married woman gave birth to a child and afterwards admitted that it was the child, not of her husband, but of the co-respondent. Then suppose that she was divorced and married the co-respondent and they took the child to live with them. If she afterwards divorced the second husband and obtained in those proceedings an order for custody of the child, that would, it is said, amount to a finding that the child was the child, not of her first husband, but of the co-respondent, and this might operate to the prejudice of the child, because it would amount to a finding of illegitimacy. The answer to this point is, however, this. An order for custody is an order in personam as between the two parties to the proceedings. It does not operate in rem so as to affect the status of the child. The order of the court in the case mentioned is no more prejudicial to the child than the previous admission of the mother. Even if the mother had made no prior admission, but made it only on the application for custody, that would not prejudice the child any more than any other admission which she might make about the paternity of her child. It would be no more prejudicial than a like order made by the Chancery Division. The objection is, therefore, without foundation.

I have now dealt with all the points made by counsel for the husband. None of them touches the crucial matter, which is the true construction of s. 26. That section plainly gives jurisdiction to the Divorce Court, and we should, I think, uphold that jurisdiction especially when it is so just and convenient and saves so much expense. We should not send the parties to the Chancery Division. I would, therefore, allow this appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: When the wife petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of the desertion of her husband her petition erroneously stated that there was issue of the marriage a child born on Feb. 9, 1944, and by her prayer she asked that she might have the custody of her said child and that the husband should pay such sum by way of maintenance of the child as the court should deem fit. When the petition was heard on Nov. 22, 1951, counsel for the wife applied for and obtained leave to amend the petition. One amendment had the result that the petition records that there was no issue of the marriage. The prayer was amended so as to omit the claim for custody. Such amendment was made because of the decision of BARNARD, J., in Harrison v. Harrison (1) which was very properly cited to the court. Had it been intended to challenge that decision it seems probable that the course would have been adopted of allowing the prayer for custody to remain, but drawing the attention of the court to Harrison v. Harrison (1) and stating that it was hoped to debate its correctness in the Court of Appeal. The prayer for maintenance of the child remained, the words being amended so as to read:

"That the respondent do pay to the petitioner such sum by way of maintenance of her child Ian Kenneth as to the court may seem fit."

In reliance on Harrison v. Harrison (1) counsel asked the judge to adjourn the question of the amount of maintenance to the registrar. In making this application counsel usefully cited certain words from the judgment of BARNARD, J., as follows ([1951] 2 All E.R. 348):

"I am concerned solely with a claim for legal custody. The wife, already, has the de facto custody, and, so far as maintenance is concerned, the fact that a man marries a woman with a young child, whether he be the father of the child or not, is a matter which the court would take into consideration in awarding the woman maintenance after the dissolution of the marriage, assuming the child was still under age and needing support. For the reasons I have given, this summons must be dismissed."

A Counsel also asked the judge to make any comments he might feel desirable. The judge ordered that maintenance be adjourned to the registrar. He added: "I think in the heartless circumstances in which he broke up a happy marriage the wife may well look for some maintenance". Counsel then added in conclusion: "My Lord, as it is his child but born out of wedlock. I am obliged to your Lordship". That was on Nov. 22, 1951. Thereafter there was an application by the wife for maintenance. An order was made on Sept. 11, 1952. An appeal to the special commissioner in chambers was dismissed on Oct. 28, 1952. From that dismissal there is an appeal pending in this court and on behalf of the husband it is not disputed that in deciding the question of amount full effect can be given to the considerations referred to by BARNARD, J., in his judgment in Harrison v. Harrison (1). Unless this judgment is held to have been erroneous, the question in the pending appeal appears to be as to what sum the husband can pay and should be ordered to pay, regard being had to the fact that the wife has to support the child.

C The wife made further applications. She applied to the registrar for leave to refer an application for the custody and maintenance of the child to the judge in chambers. She apparently made this application under r. 54 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which reads as follows:

D "The petitioner, or (if he has entered an appearance to the petition for this purpose) the respondent spouse or the guardian of any children of the marriage or any person who has obtained leave to intervene in the cause for the purpose of applying for the custody of, or who has under an order of the court the custody or control of, such children may at any time, either before or after final decree, apply to a judge for an order relating to the custody or education of the children of the marriage, or E for directions that proper proceedings be taken for placing such children under the protection of the Chancery Division."

The rule refers to the "children of the marriage". On Dec. 12, 1952, the special commissioner dismissed the wife's applications for custody and maintenance of the child. From these orders the present appeals are brought. As the wife has got de facto custody of the child, as she abandoned her original claim F for custody in her petition, as in assessing maintenance for the wife regard can be had to her responsibilities for the child, as the husband makes no claim to the child, and as the child, being in Scotland, is out of the jurisdiction, it does not seem probable that the issues raised in these appeals would have been debated had it not been that both parties were sustained by legal aid.

G The issues raised depend on the construction of s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. That sub-section is the ultimate successor of s. 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. Such changes of wording as have taken place do not throw light on the present problem. Neither is assistance gained by examining the wording of sections in the statutes between 1857 and 1950, namely, s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 6 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, and s. 193 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) I Act, 1925. It is to be noted that, even in the case of children in regard to whom the jurisdiction is beyond question, the court is empowered to direct, if it thinks fit, that proper proceedings be taken for placing the children under the protection of the court. The consideration of main importance is that in s. 35 of the Act of 1857, as in s. 26 (1) of the Act of 1950, are the words "the custody, maintenance and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of" the proceedings. The question to be determined is whether in the context the word "children" includes those who at the time are illegitimate.

In Woolwich Union v. Fulham Union (4) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred in his judgment to the technical rule of law that when the words "child" or "children" occur in a statute the prima facie meaning is legitimate child or legitimate children. He proceeded to say ([1906] 2 K.B. 246):

"It is of course true that that is only prima facie the meaning to be given to the word, and that a wider meaning may, in the case of some statutes, be given to it, so as to include an illegitimate child or illegitimate children, where that meaning is more consonant with the object of the statute."

Then, having given his view as to the meaning to be ascribed in the enactment then in question, he continued (ibid., 247):

"But, apart from that consideration, there is another reason why I should hesitate so to construe it. A long time has now elapsed since 1846 and during all that length of time numerous cases must have occurred in which the question whether the proviso to s. 1 of the [Poor Removal Act, 1846] was applicable to an illegitimate child might have been raised; but, apparently, there is no case in the books in which that point was raised . . ."

If the wording of s. 26 (1) is clear then, of course, full effect must be given to it, but it is not without some significance that in a situation which could so very often have arisen since 1857 there is no trace until comparatively recently of the point having been taken that on a dissolution of marriage there may be orders for maintenance and custody of illegitimate children if the parties assert and admit that the children are in fact theirs. If the provisions of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, apply, then the effect on an illegitimate person is to "render" him or her legitimate. In such a case the legitimated person can be covered by the word "children" in s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950: see C. v. C. (3). It may well be that it would on occasion be very convenient if on a decree of divorce the court could make orders as to the custody, maintenance and education of those acknowledged by the parties to be their illegitimate children. But considerations of convenience are for the legislature. The question for the court is one of the construction of the Act. It is to be noted that it was provided by s. 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, that in any case where a decree for judicial separation or a decree either nisi or absolute for divorce shall be pronounced the court pronouncing such decree may thereby declare the parent by reason of whose misconduct such decree is made to be a person unfit to have the custody of the children (if any) of the marriage. If by the then existing law the court had power to deal with the custody, maintenance and education of all children of the parties, whether legitimate or not, it is difficult to see why the power given by s. 7 should only have been given in reference to the children of the marriage.

In my judgment, the phrase in s. 26 (1) of the Act of 1950, "the children of the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings" has reference to the children of a "marriage", using inverted commas so as to include and comprehend cases where the "marriage" may be declared not to have been a marriage. It seems to me that the reason why the phrase "children of the marriage" was not employed was that the mention of proceedings for nullity of marriage rendered such a phrase inappropriate. In s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1950 is the phrase "infant children of the marriage"; in s. 24 (1) and (2) occurs the phrase "children of the marriage"; in s. 30 (3) is the phrase "the children, if any, of the marriage". If the court under s. 26 (1) has power to deal with the custody, maintenance and education of all children of the parties whether legitimate or not, it seems to me that some or all of the powers of the court under s. 23, s. 24 and s. 30 would not have been limited so as only to be referable to the children of the marriage.

The view that I have formed is, I think, supported by the language of COTTON, L.J., in Langworthy v. Langworthy (2). In that case the marriage in fact had and solemnised was declared to be null and void as not having been solemnised according to law. In reference to s. 35 of the Act of 1857 COTTON, L.J., said (11 P.D. 88):

“Now, does the enactment apply to this child although there was no valid marriage? I am of opinion that it does. The section refers to the children not ‘of the marriage’ but ‘the marriage of whose parents is the subject of such suit or other proceedings’. The section includes sentences of nullity of marriage, and must, therefore, in my judgment, be considered as enacting that in cases where there is no valid marriage the children of the union may be provided for.”

In my judgment, s. 26 (1) of the Act of 1950 refers to the children of the “marriage” union even where such “marriage” is declared to be null and void. For the reasons which I have given I find myself in agreement with the judgment of BARNARD, J., in Harrison v. Harrison (1), and I would dismiss these appeals.

DENNING, L.J.: The court being equally divided in opinion the decision of the judge below will stand and the appeals will be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. UNIVERSAL GRINDING WHEEL CO., LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), May 7, 1953.]

Profits Tax—Distribution—Exclusion of “sum applied in reducing share capital”—Company’s redemption of preference shares—Price equal to nominal amount of share plus a premium—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 36 (1).

By s. 30 (1) and (2) of the Finance Act, 1947, as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 7, profits tax was chargeable at 25 per cent. on the profits of a trade or business, with a reduction of 15 per cent. on the excess of profits chargeable in any chargeable accounting period over the net relevant distributions to proprietors in that period. By the proviso to s. 36 (1): “. . . no sum applied . . . in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution.” In accordance with the terms of its articles, under powers conferred by s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, a company redeemed four hundred thousand preference shares at a price equal to the nominal amount of the share plus a premium of 7s. per share, the redemption being carried out in part by an issue of new capital and in part (in particular, as to the premium of 7s.) out of profits available for dividend.

HELD: as the company, in redeeming its preference shares, was bound by its articles to apply 27s. for every £1 nominal value thereof, the full 27s. per share was applied in reducing its share capital within the meaning of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Act of 1947, and no part of it represented a distribution under the Act chargeable to the tax.

The respondent company appealed against an assessment to profits tax made on the company for the twelve months to Sept. 30, 1948, showing tax payable in the amount of £56,250, viz., £112,500, less relief in respect of non-distribution £56,250.

In December, 1947, the company redeemed four hundred thousand £1 preference shares at a redemption price of 27s. per share, together with a sum equal to certain dividends (as to which no question arose) under a power contained in the articles of association of the company (in accordance with the Companies Act, 1929, s. 46), which provided that the redemption price should be the nominal amount of the shares plus a premium of 7s. per share and a sum equal to certain dividends. The available profits of the company not being sufficient to provide the funds necessary for the redemption, the company issued four hundred thousand new preference shares. It obtained subscriptions from brokers for the whole of these shares at a price of 20s. 6d. per share amounting after deduction of commission to £402,500 and set aside that sum to a sinking fund for redemption of the old shares and also set aside £148,384 out of its profits standing to general reserve. The company allotted to the holders of the old preference shares who elected to accept an invitation to convert them into the new shares, new shares at 20s. 6d. per share, made cash payments to them of 6s. 6d. per share, and allotted the balance of new shares to brokers, to whom it paid 20s. 6d. in respect of every share allotted to holders of old shares converted in recoupment of the price already paid by the brokers.

The company contended that the redemption of the four hundred thousand old preference shares was a reduction of its share capital at 27s. per share and that the whole amount paid was "applied . . . in reducing the share capital" of the company within the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, and that, in particular, the company, in redeeming the old preference shares at a cost of 27s. per share, was purchasing its own shares at a price of 27s. per share as permitted by the Companies Acts. The Crown contended that the amount applied in reducing the share capital of the company could not be greater than the amount by which its share capital had been reduced, which was from £1,000,000 to £600,000 or £400,000 only, within the meaning of s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947.

The commissioners held that the redemption of the four hundred thousand preference shares was simply a way of reducing the share capital of the company, for which the company had to apply 27s. in payment for each share. Accordingly, they held that the full amount representing 27s. per share was applied in reducing the share capital of the company within the meaning of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Act of 1947, and allowed the company's appeal. The Crown appealed.

UPJOHN, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the Special Commissioners given on Jan. 15, 1952, and it relates to a difficult matter of profits tax. The respondent company, Universal Grinding Wheel Co., Ltd., was incorporated on Mar. 8, 1935, with a nominal capital of £600,000 divided into four hundred thousand five per cent. cumulative participating preference shares of £1 each and four hundred thousand ordinary shares of 10s. each. By art. 8 of the articles of association provision was made in accordance with powers given by s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, for the redemption of the preference shares. Article 8 (i) provided for the redemption of those preference shares at a price equal to the nominal amount of each share plus a premium of 7s. per share, together with certain other sums relating to any deficiency of dividend which I need not mention. Briefly stated, these were redeemable preference shares, redeemable at a price of 27s. In 1947 the company redeemed those preference shares. That redemption was carried out in part by an issue of new capital and in part out of profits available for dividend. In particular, the premium of 7s. was paid out of such profits, that being required by s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, and by the company's articles of association.

I have to determine whether, for the purposes of s. 36 of the Finance Act, 1947, the company has applied, as the Crown say, 20s., or, as the company says, 27s., in reducing each £1 nominal share of its preference capital.

Profits tax was originally created under the name of national defence contribution by Part III of the Finance Act, 1937. It was substantially amended as the profits tax in Part IV of the Finance Act, 1947, s. 30 of which, as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 7, provides:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act—(a) the profits tax to be charged for any chargeable accounting period on the profits of a trade or business shall be of an amount equal to twenty-five per cent. of the profits . . . (2) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, if, in the case of any trade or business, the net relevant distributions to proprietors (as defined in the subsequent provisions of this Part of this Act) for any chargeable accounting period are less than the profits thereof for that period chargeable to the profits tax, the amount chargeable by way of the profits tax in respect of that period shall be reduced by an amount equal to fifteen per cent. of the difference."

The effect of these rather complicated provisions was to charge a tax of 25 per cent. on what are called the "net relevant distributions", and ten per cent. on the profits retained in the business. Section 34 (2) defines "the net relevant distributions" to proprietors, as follows:

"The net relevant distributions to proprietors for any chargeable accounting period of a body corporate, society or other body are so much of the gross relevant distributions to the proprietors for that period of that body corporate, society or other body (as defined by the next succeeding section) as bears to the whole of the said gross relevant distributions the same proportion that the profits for that period bear to the profits therefor computed without abatement and including franked investment income."

"Gross relevant distributions" is defined in s. 35 (1) as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of this and the two next succeeding sections, the gross relevant distributions to proprietors for any chargeable accounting period of a body corporate, society or other body, are the total distributions to the members of the body corporate, society or other body, not being distributions allowable as deductions in computing the profits of the trade or business for any period for the purposes of the profits tax, and being . . . (c) in the case of the last chargeable accounting period in which the trade or business is carried on, so much of any distribution made after the end of that period (not being a distribution to which para. (a) of this sub-section [relating to dividends] applies) as is not a distribution of capital, and, for the purposes of para. (c) of this sub-section, the distributions which are to be treated as distributions of capital shall not."

in the case of distributions made by a body corporate with a share capital, exceed an amount equal to the total nominal amount of the paid-up share capital thereof together, where the body corporate has issued shares at a premium for cash, with the aggregate of the amounts of the premiums."

"Distribution" is defined in s. 36 (1) as follows:

"Subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, wherever—
(a) any amount is distributed directly or indirectly by way of dividend or cash bonus to any person; or (b) assets are distributed in kind to any person; or (c) where the trade or business is carried on by a body corporate the directors whereof have a controlling interest therein, an amount is applied, whether by way of remuneration, loans or otherwise, for the benefit of any person, there shall be deemed for the purposes of the last preceding section to be a distribution to that person of that amount or, as the case may be, of an amount equal to the value of those assets."

Pausing there, it is admitted that prima facie the distribution of 27s. a share is a distribution for the purpose of the Act, but it is said that the next proviso takes it out of the definition:

"Provided that no sum applied in repaying a loan or in reducing the share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business shall be treated as a distribution."

The sum of 20s. per share was admittedly applied in reducing capital, and the question is whether, having regard to the proviso to s. 36 (1), the extra sum of 7s. is to be treated as being a distribution or not. The Crown says that the section refers to the amount applied, not in redeeming shares, but in reducing capital, and that a greater sum cannot be applied in reducing capital than the nominal amount by which the capital is reduced in the balance sheet. It is said that the true effect of what took place in 1947 was that 20s. per share was applied in reducing the capital and 7s. per share in paying a premium to the preference shareholders. The Crown points out that the premium is necessarily paid out of profits, having regard to s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, and the whole scheme of the Finance Act, 1947, is that the distribution of any profits forfeits any non-distribution relief. They point to the provisions of s. 35 (1), which precludes any distribution in a liquidation representing accumulated profits being treated as capital beyond the amount of the nominal capital, and submit that, analysing the matter accurately and looking at the company's balance sheet, 20s. goes to reduce £1 of preference capital and 7s. goes to reduce the profit and loss account.

On the other hand, the company says that the section must be strictly construed, and, in taxing the subject, it is not right to rely on any supposed general scheme or policy of the Act in distributing the profits of the company. I agree with that. Then the company says that 27s. has, in fact, been applied in reducing the capital and the question is posed how else has the 7s. been applied? The company submits, first, that the redemption of shares is a purchase of shares by the company, and, secondly, that the company which purchases its own shares thereby reduces the capital. It relies on certain well-known passages in Trevor v. Whitworth (1) and in British & American Trustee & Finance Corpn. v. Couper (2), in support of those propositions, which cannot be disputed. Therefore, the company says that it has had to apply 27s. in the purchase of its shares and has thereby reduced its capital. It points to the fact that the articles speak of a redemption price, and points out that there is nothing to preclude a company applying assets to a greater value than £1 in paying off a £1 share: Ex p. Westburn Sugar Refineries, Ltd. (3). There is no dispute (although it does not determine the matter) that the effect of a redemption of preference shares pursuant to s. 46 of the Companies Act, 1929, effects a reduction in the nominal amount as well as in the paid-up capital of the company. That was determined by UTHWATT, J., in Re Serpell & Co., Ltd. (4).

The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the company. They said this in the Case Stated:

A "In our opinion, the redemption of the four hundred thousand preference shares was simply a way of reducing the share capital of the company. In order to reduce the share capital in that way the company had to apply, and did apply, 27s. in payment for each share. We held that the full amount representing 27s. per share was therefore applied in reducing the share capital of the company within the meaning of the proviso to s. 36 (1) of the Act."

B I have found this a most difficult case, and my mind has fluctuated several times during the course of the argument. I disregard any supposed scheme of taxation in the Act and ask myself the question: What sum has been applied in reducing the share capital of the company? Ought one, as the Crown says, to explore the application of this sum of 27s. per share into the company's balance sheet and find that 20s. goes to reduce the capital and 7s. to reduce the profit and loss account? Or ought one to treat this as one transaction and say that, in order to get rid of these shares and thereby reduce the capital by that amount, the company was compelled by its articles to apply the 27s. per share? A company may reduce its capital in many ways, and one way is by redeeming its preference shares if so authorised by its articles. To reduce the capital by that method, the company was bound by its articles to apply 27s. for the redemption of every £1 nominal of capital reduced. On the whole, not without some hesitation, I think the Special Commissioners were right, and I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. COMPTROLLER-GENERAL OF PATENTS.

Ex parte PARKE, DAVIS & CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 11, 12, 1953.]

F Patent—Licence—Compulsory licence—Medicine—Application for compulsory licence within three years from grant—Effect of International Convention for Protection of Industrial Property, art. 5 (A) (4)—Patents Act, 1949 (c. 87), s. 41 (1) (b), s. 45 (3).

G The applicants, a company registered in the United States of America, obtained a grant of three British letters patent concerning a process for the production of a non-toxic antibiotic. Within three years of the grant the respondents applied to the Comptroller-General of Patents for a compulsory licence under the Patents Act, 1949, s. 41 (1) (b). The applicants applied for an order prohibiting the Comptroller-General from entertaining the application on the ground that, having regard to the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, art. 5 (A) (4), and s. 45 (3) of the Act of 1949, no compulsory licence could be granted before the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of the patent.

H HELD: on its true construction when read as a whole, art. 5 referred simply to measures, whether by way of grant of compulsory licence or revocation, to prevent abuses of monopoly rights, and it had no reference to the special provisions of the English legislation contained in s. 41 (1) of the Act of 1949, under which a compulsory licence could be granted in respect of substances capable of being used as food or medicine, and, therefore, in acceding to the respondents' application the Comptroller-

General would not be making an order "at variance with any . . . convention" within s. 45 (3) of the Act of 1949, and the order of prohibition would not issue.

Decision of the DIVISIONAL COURT ([1953] 1 All E.R. 862), affirmed.

APPEAL by the applicants from an order of the Divisional Court, dated Mar. 20, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 862.

An application was made by the patentees, Parke, Davis & Co. (a corporation organised under the law of the State of Michigan in the United States of America) for an order of prohibition prohibiting the Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks from entertaining an application made under the Patents Act, 1949, s. 41, by the respondents, British Drug Houses, Ltd., for compulsory licences under the patents No. 652280, No. 660381 and No. 652273.

By art. 5 (A) (4) of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, ratified by the United Kingdom on June 30, 1938, it was provided that an application for the grant of a compulsory licence might not be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of a patent, and it was contended by the applicants that that provision applied to applications for compulsory licences made under s. 41 (1). It was contended by the respondents that art. 5 applied only to compulsory licences to prevent an abuse of monopoly rights and not to compulsory licences to exercise patents relating to food or medicine (with which s. 41 (1) was concerned). The Divisional Court dismissed the motion.

Pritt, Q.C., Shelley, Q.C., and Aldous for the applicants, Parke, Davis & Co.

Sir Hartley Shawcross, Q.C., and Graham, Q.C., for the respondents, British Drug Houses, Ltd.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.) and P. J. S. Bevan for the Comptroller-General of Patents.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The facts are conveniently set out in the statement of the applicants, which was filed pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 59, r. 3 (2):

"1. The applicants are a corporation organised under the laws of the State of Michigan in the United States of America and are large manufacturers of pharmaceutical products. Parke, Davis & Company, Ltd., a corporation organised under the laws of the State of Colorado, U.S.A., and a wholly owned subsidiary of the applicants, have a factory in this country where they carry on a large business in the manufacture and sale of pharmaceutical products including in particular the synthesis of an antibiotic, 'chloramphenicol'. 2. The applicants are the grantees and registered proprietors of a number of letters patent relating to their said synthetic manufacture of chloramphenicol, and, in particular, letters patent No. 652280, No. 660381 and No. 652273. These patents were applied for in pursuance of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property ratified by this country on June 30, 1938, and were based upon original applications made in the United States of America, and letters patent were granted in this country in respect thereof on [certain specified dates]. 3. The respondents, who are also manufacturers in this country of pharmaceutical products, have applied to the Comptroller-General of Patents and Designs for a compulsory licence to be granted to them under the said patents pursuant to the Patents Act, 1949, s. 41, to enable them also to manufacture the said substance. 4. By the Patents Act, 1949, s. 45 (3), it is provided that no order can be made in pursuance of an application under the said s. 41 which would be at variance with any convention

A applying to the United Kingdom and any convention country, a description which includes the United States of America. Article 5 (A) (4) of the International Convention above mentioned, which is a convention falling within the said s. 41, is as follows: 'In any case, an application for the grant of a compulsory licence may not be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the issue of the patent . . . ' 5. In the premises, as three years have not expired since the grant of any of the said letters patent, the Comptroller has no jurisdiction to entertain the said application. 6. By the Patents Rules, 1949, rr. 114, 115, 116, the Comptroller is under a duty not to permit the application to proceed unless he is satisfied that there is a prima facie case. Although the Comptroller has no jurisdiction to entertain the said application he has allowed the application to proceed pursuant to the said r. 115. 7. The applicants ask that an order of prohibition should be made to restrain the Comptroller-General of Patents and Designs from permitting the said application to proceed."

B The Divisional Court dismissed the motion after hearing counsel for Parke, Davis & Co., and counsel on behalf of British Drug Houses, Ltd. The Divisional Court also heard the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Comptroller-General of Patents, on the question whether or not prohibition would lie in a case of this nature where a right of appeal is specifically given. We have not thought it necessary to hear the Attorney-General on that matter in view of the conclusion at which this court has arrived on the merits of the appeal generally.

C The history of the law in relation to patents, which goes back to 1883, has been discussed in this court. The Patents and Designs Act, 1907, was amended by a number of Acts. Over a considerable period of years there have been international conventions held from time to time to bring about, so far as possible, agreement as to the rights of patentees in the countries which were parties to the conventions. As counsel for the respondents pointed out, after there had been a convention and the delegates had agreed on certain articles, those articles were put before the governments of the countries concerned, and in due course in this country there followed legislation and the formal ratification by the government. For some thirty years prior to 1949 legislation had dealt specifically with manufactured articles which might be for use as food or medicine. The amending Act (the Patents and Designs Act, 1919) introduced specific provisions for patents in relation to food and drugs, and matters of that kind have not been, so far as we are told, the subject-matter of agreement at any convention. But over a considerable period of years other patented articles were made subject to an international obligation embraced in the agreed article or articles resulting from a particular convention. In 1925, as a result of agreements at the Hague Convention, an article was ultimately ratified in this country that individual States could deal with abuses of monopoly by legislation provided, first, that compulsory licences could not be granted for three years after the date of the letters patent, and, secondly, that there should be revocation only if compulsory licensing was insufficient. That article was followed in the Patents and Designs (Convention) Act, 1928, s. 2 of which amended s. 27 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, so as to incorporate into s. 27 of the Act of 1907 the provision that there should be no grant of a compulsory licence for three years from the date of the grant of the letters patent.

H That system has been followed ever since. The amendment made by the Act of 1928 followed the article of 1925, which was, in turn, ratified by the British government on May 1, 1928. Article 5 of the convention of 1925 contains these provisions:

"The importation by the patentee into the country where the patent has been granted of articles manufactured in any of the countries of the Union shall not entail revocation of the patent. Nevertheless each of the contracting countries shall have the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work. These measures shall not provide for the revocation of the patent unless the grant of compulsory licences is insufficient to prevent such abuses. In no case can the patent be made liable to such measures before the expiration of at least three years from the date of grant of the patent and then only if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons."

It is agreed that that provision was dealing with "abuses of monopoly". In such circumstances the contracting countries had the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work, but in no case could the patent be made liable to such measures before the expiration of at least three years from the date of the grant of the patent. At that time there had been for some years as part of the law of this country the specific provisions for licences in respect of food and drugs, and those provisions must have been known to the delegates who were present at the Hague when the 1925 agreement was reached. It has not been suggested that the 1925 article to which I have referred, or the Act of 1928, affected patents in relation to food and drugs in any degree.

In 1934 there was another convention, followed by the Patents, etc. (International Conventions) Act, 1938, which received the Royal Assent on May 26, 1938, and in accordance with the usual practice, the ratification by the government of the United Kingdom of the articles agreed on by the convention was signified on June 30 of the same year. The wording of art. 5 was slightly changed. The material parts of art. 5 of the 1934 convention are:

"A. (1) The importation by the patentee into the country where the patent has been granted of articles manufactured in any of the countries of the Union shall not entail revocation of the patent. (2) Nevertheless each of the countries of the Union shall have the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work. (3) These measures shall not provide for the revocation of the patent unless the grant of compulsory licences is insufficient to prevent such abuses. (4) In any case, an application for the grant of a compulsory licence may not be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the issue of the patent, and this licence may only be granted if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons. No proceedings for the revocation of a patent may be instituted before the expiration of two years from the date of the granting of the first compulsory licence."

To all intents and purposes, paras. (1), (2) and (3) are the same as the corresponding paragraphs of art. 5 of the 1925 convention; it is in art. 5 (A) (4) that a change in the 1934 article took place.

It was submitted on behalf of the applicants that as they have the patent rights in respect of certain substances connected with the manufacture of food or medicine, no licence in respect of those patents can be granted until the expiration of three years from the date of the issue of the patent. It is common ground that a period of three years has not yet run from the issue of the patent in any of the three cases, so that, although those manufactured articles may be used for food or medical purposes, their case is that for three years from the date of the grant of the patent no licence can be granted by the Comptroller. In other words, they claim that he has no jurisdiction to grant any such licence, and, if that claim be right, the result would be that whenever a patent had been issued for the manufacture of some valuable medicine, however small the quantity the patentees might be able to manufacture, no licence could be granted to anyone else until the three years' period has elapsed.

That submission is based on the wording of art. 5 (A) (4) and on a change which was made in the law by the Patents Act, 1949, which consolidated certain enactments relating to patents. The material part of that Act is contained in s. 37 to s. 45 and is headed: "Compulsory licences". Section 37 deals with compulsory indorsements of licences, and s. 37 (1) provides:

A "At any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the sealing of a patent, any person interested may apply to the Comptroller upon any one or more of the grounds specified in the next following sub-section for a licence under the patent . . . with the words 'licences of right'."

B That section preserves the three years' period before which a licence cannot be obtained, and in so doing it is in accordance with art. 5 (A) (4) of the 1934 convention. Section 37 (2) reads:

C "The grounds upon which application may be made for an order under this section are as follows, that is to say:—(a) that the patented invention, being capable of being commercially worked in the United Kingdom, is not being commercially worked therein or is not being so worked to the fullest extent that is reasonably practicable; (b) that a demand for the patented article in the United Kingdom is not being met on reasonable terms, or is being met to a substantial extent by importation; (c) that the commercial working of the invention in the United Kingdom is being prevented or hindered by the importation of the patented article; (d) that by reason of the refusal of the patentee to grant a licence or licences on reasonable terms—(i) a market for the export of the patented article manufactured in the United Kingdom is not being supplied; or (ii) the working or efficient working in the United Kingdom of any other patented invention which makes a substantial contribution to the art is prevented or hindered; or (iii) the establishment or development of commercial or industrial activities in the United Kingdom is unfairly prejudiced; (e) that by reason of conditions imposed by the patentee upon the grant of licences under the patent, or upon the purchase, hire or use of the patented article or process, the manufacture, use or sale of materials not protected by the patent, or the establishment or development of commercial or industrial activities in the United Kingdom is unfairly prejudiced."

F Those grounds are, in my view, all in the nature of abuses of the monopoly. If one or other of those reasons arose at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the sealing of a patent, any person interested could apply for a licence. Section 38 contains provisions as to licences under s. 37, and s. 39 deals with the exercise of powers on applications under s. 37. Section 40 deals with indorsement, etc., on application of the Crown. To none of those need I refer.

G Section 41 deals with inventions relating to food or medicine, etc., and s. 41 (1) provides:

H "Without prejudice to the foregoing provisions of this Act, where a patent is in force in respect of—(a) a substance capable of being used as food or medicine or in the production of food or medicine; or (b) a process for producing such a substance as aforesaid; or (c) any invention capable of being used as or as part of a surgical or curative device, the Comptroller shall, on application made to him by any person interested, order the grant to the applicant of a licence under the patent on such terms as he thinks fit, unless it appears to him that there are good reasons for refusing the application."

I draw attention to the word "shall", which appears in that sub-section. In the provisions as to the grant of a compulsory licence in the case of other goods the statutory provision seems to have been in each statute "may". Section 41 continues:

"(2) In settling the terms of licences under this section the Comptroller shall endeavour to secure that food, medicines, and surgical and curative devices shall be available to the public at the lowest prices consistent with the patentees' deriving a reasonable advantage from their patent rights. (3) A licence granted under this section shall entitle the licensee to make, use, exercise and vend the invention as a food or medicine, or for the purposes of the production of food or medicine or as part of a surgical or curative device, but for no other purposes."

Thus, if a person secured a licence under s. 41 of the Act of 1949 the Comptroller might impose terms and the person who obtained the licence could use the invention as food or medicine or for the purposes of the production of food or medicine, but for no other purpose. It seems to me that the scope of s. 41, which follows the principle of the earlier sections on inventions relating to food or medicine, is that the Comptroller should have the widest powers possible and should so carry out his duties as to secure that food, medicine, and the like can be available to the public at the lowest prices consistent with reasonable remuneration to the patentees.

That section, if it stood alone, would, doubtless, have preserved the position as it was before, because in s. 41 there is no three years' period as there is in s. 37. Section 42, which is headed: "Revocation of patent", provides in sub-s. (1):

"Where an order for the grant of a licence under a patent has been made in pursuance of an application under s. 37 of this Act, any person interested may, at any time after the expiration of two years from the date of that order, apply to the Comptroller for the revocation of the patent upon any of the grounds specified in sub-s. (2) of the said s. 37 . . ."

I am inclined to think it would have been very much better if s. 42 had preceded s. 41, because s. 42 is dealing with a matter under s. 37, whereas s. 41 deals with inventions relating to food or medicine, which had always been treated differently.

Section 45 (3) is in these terms:

"No order shall be made in pursuance of any application under s. 37 to s. 42 of this Act which would be at variance with any treaty, convention, arrangement or engagement applying to the United Kingdom and any convention country."

It is said on that sub-section that, if the Comptroller contemplates making an order for a compulsory licence, or licences such as the respondents, British Drug Houses, Ltd., seek, he is doing something which would be at variance with art. 5 (A) (4). I have found considerable difficulty in understanding why that provision in s. 45 (3), which appears at first sight to make an order dealing with inventions relating to food and medicines subject to any article of any convention, was put into the Act since patents in relation to foods and medicines had not been dealt with or considered by any convention so far as I have seen. Counsel for the respondents faces that difficulty and points out that it may well be that s. 41 was included advisedly in s. 45 (3) because of something in some other convention which had gone before or something which might follow. It may be that there is some reason for it, but I hope I am not unduly critical when I say I feel it is a provision which may have slipped in accidentally. That is not meant as criticism of the draftsman. The task of a draftsman is difficult indeed. It is even more difficult when one has to deal with the consolidation of a number of Acts relating to patents and attempt to align them with articles in various conventions over a great number of years. It has, however, to be faced that s. 45 (3) appears to bring inventions relating to food and medicine which are dealt with in s. 41 within the scope of articles resulting from conventions.

The question for discussion on this appeal is: What is the true meaning of art. 5 (A) (4) of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, 1934? I have already read that article, and I have read the earlier one of 1925. There are two observations I would make. The first is that I do not think it is right to take the words in para. (4) by themselves and have no regard to the surrounding provisions. The second point is that the articles that we have before us are translations. The original is in French, and in the 1925 convention the one text is set against the other on opposite pages, whereas in the later ones the one text follows on the other. Article 5 (A) (4) in both the conventions of 1925 and 1934 begins: "En tout cas". One would think the English translation would be given the same way, but it is not. That is because of what follows; it has to be put into the proper framework. It is clear that art. 5 of 1925 does not cover inventions relating to food or medicines, but it is submitted that the special provisions of s. 45 (3), of the Act of 1949, namely: makes it necessary to examine this question carefully, and the more so in view of the change that was made in art. 5 (A) (4) in 1934. When the Comptroller has before him an application under s. 41 of the Act, it is his duty to bear in mind the provisions of s. 45 (3) so that he does not make an order which is at variance with anything in the article which he has to consider, in this case art. 5.

Counsel submitted on behalf of the applicants that the application of British Drug Houses was an application for the grant of a compulsory licence and that such an application cannot be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the issue of the patent, which time has not yet run. Therefore, it was said, the duty of the Comptroller was to refuse the application forthwith. On the other side it was submitted that it was for the Comptroller to consider the application made to him and to see whether or not, on an examination of art. 5, he was asked to do something which would infringe s. 45 (3). The argument on behalf of British Drug Houses was that, when art. 5 is fully examined, there is nothing which the Comptroller is asked to do which can be said to be at variance with anything contained in the article.

Article 5 (A) (1) provides:

Importation by the patentee into the country where the patent has been granted of articles manufactured elsewhere is something that the country which has granted the patent might regard as undesirable, and that is in the nature of an abuse of the monopoly. Article 5 (A) (2) provides:

"Nevertheless each of the countries of the Union shall have the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work."

The body of that sub-article is preserving to the individual State the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent abuses of the monopoly. Then art. 5 (A) (3) provides:

"These measures shall not provide for the revocation of the patent unless the grant of compulsory licences is insufficient to prevent such abuses."

So far, just as in the 1925 articles, one is dealing with abuses of the kind which are embraced in s. 37 (2) of the 1949 Act and with nothing else. Now I come to art. 5 (A) (4). The argument of counsel for the applicants is that "en tout cas" means in any and in every case, so the sub-article would read:

"In any case and in every case an application for the grant of a compulsory licence may not be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the issue of the patent, and this licence may only be granted if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons."

What meaning can be attached to those words,

"and this licence may only be granted if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons" ?

That consideration does not apply to the grant of a licence in regard to inventions relating to food or medicine. The guiding thought in s. 41 (1) appears to me to be that a person interested in that matter may apply to the Comptroller for a licence, and thereupon

"the Comptroller shall . . . order the grant to the applicant of a licence under the patent on such terms as he thinks fit, unless it appears to him that there are good reasons for refusing the application."

In view of the terms of s. 41 (1), I do not see any bearing of the words in art. 5 (A) (4),

"and this licence may only be granted if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons."

There is nothing in respect of which the patentee has to justify himself. That consideration forces me to the conclusion that art. 5 (A) (4) is dealing with the same subject-matter as art. 5 (A) (1), (2) and (3), that is to say, abuses of the kind now embraced by s. 37 (2) of the Act of 1949. Article 5 (A) (4) goes further:

"No proceedings for the revocation of a patent may be instituted before the expiration of two years from the date of the granting of the first compulsory licence."

I thought at one time that meant that a compulsory licence could not be granted for three years and there could be no proceedings for the revocation of the patent before the expiration of two years from the date of the granting of the first compulsory licence, but counsel for the applicants pointed out that there is no provision anywhere in any of the Acts for the revocation of a patent in regard to substances relating to food or medicine, and I accept that at once. That seems to me to support the view which I have formed, that art. 5 (A) (4) is throughout dealing with the same subject as art. 5 (A) (1), (2) and (3). Although I recognise that the question which this court has to consider is one of construction alone, it seems to me it would be an amazing thing if there had been a departure from the recognised practice of this country, which has been not to recognise or to make any international arrangement as to inventions relating to food or medicine. It would be surprising if in the result the legislature had by s. 45 (3) and art. 5 (A) (4), prevented this country from granting a licence for the manufacture of articles of food or of much needed medicines for a number of years. It would certainly be contrary to the practice which had been followed up to the passing of the Act of 1949, and I am relieved that on my view of the construction I have not to come to any such conclusion.

When this case was before the Divisional Court LLOYD-JACOB, J., said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 865):

"As I read this article [art. 5 (A)], it is concerned to express the restrictions which the contracting parties agree to accept on their right to take legislative measures to prevent abuses resulting from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by patents. Where it refers to compulsory licences, the reference is to such as are concerned with the prevention of such abuses. The Patents Act, 1949, s. 37 to s. 40, set out the grounds on which such compulsory licences may be granted, and it is to be noted that these sections conform to the provisions of the article. Section 41, on the other hand, is concerned neither with the exercise by the patentee of the rights conferred by the patent nor with any abuse that may result therefrom. The sufficiency or otherwise of compulsory licences to prevent abuses cannot, therefore, arise, and the possibility of revocation on the ground of abuse does not exist. The section specifies that certain patents, viz., those relating to food, or medicine or surgical or curative devices, shall be susceptible of exercise by persons licensed by the Comptroller-General, and this irrespective of the exercise or non-exercise by the patentee. There is, therefore, no default for which the patentee could be required to justify himself by legitimate, or, indeed, any, reasons, and this provides an additional differentiation from art. 5 (A) (4)."

I agree with that reasoning, and, in my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Article 2 (1) of the International Convention signed in London in 1934 provided:

D
"Persons within the jurisdiction of each of the countries of the Union shall, as regards the protection of industrial property enjoy in all the other countries of the Union the advantages that their respective laws now grant, or may hereafter grant, to their nationals without prejudice to the rights specially provided by the present convention. Consequently they shall have the same protection as the latter, and the same legal remedy against any infringement of their rights, provided they observe the conditions and formalities imposed on nationals."

E
"Industrial property" for the purposes of the present case means patents. At the date when that convention was signed the patent law of this country, which, prima facie, was the patent law which nationals of other countries of the Union would be entitled to enjoy in this country (subject to anything to the contrary contained in the convention), included s. 38A of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, introduced into the principal Act by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, and providing by sub-s. (2) as follows:

G
"In the case of any patent for an invention intended for or capable of being used for the preparation or production of food or medicine, the Comptroller shall, unless he sees good reason to the contrary, grant to any person applying for the same, a licence limited to the use of the invention for the purposes of the preparation or production of food or medicine but not otherwise; and, in settling the terms of such licence and fixing the amount of royalty or other consideration payable, the Comptroller shall have regard to the desirability of making the food or medicine available to the public at the lowest possible price consistent with giving to the inventor due reward for the research leading to the invention."

H
It is admitted that this provision did not conflict with any provision of the convention which was in force down to the signing of the convention of 1934. The previous convention was that signed at The Hague in 1925 and the only provision in it that bears on the question raised in this case was art. 5. [His LORDSHIP read art. 5 of the 1925 convention and continued:] It was agreed before us that the provision of art. 5 was directed, and directed only, to the grant of compulsory licences in respect of patents, or the revocation of patents, on the ground of abuse, and that it had nothing to do with a licence compulsorily granted in respect of an invention intended for or capable of being used for the preparation or production of food or medicine under s. 38A (2) of the Act of 1907.

The question in this case, therefore, is whether the revised form of art. 5 adopted by the convention signed in 1934 had the effect of converting s. 38A (2) from a perfectly legitimate provision, from the international point of view, into a provision which was at variance with the new art. 5. I think one can fairly say that, if the intention of art. 5 of the 1934 convention was to produce that not unimportant result, one would have expected such intention to be expressed in clear terms. As to the construction of the 1934 art. 5, on which this case turns, it is agreed that the corresponding provisions of the 1925 art. 5 dealt only with abuses. That it was so limited in its effect is made clear by the words:

"In no case can the patent be made liable to such measures before the expiration of at least three years."

That refers back to the reference to the "necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights", and so on, and limits both the grant of a compulsory licence and the revocation of the patent to cases of abuse, as both those steps are included in the expression "such measures". It is said that in the new art. 5 of 1934 there is a most significant change of language, a change sufficiently marked to make it embrace the case of licences under patents in respect of food and medicine. Article 5 (A) (1) concerns importation, and is in the same terms as the old art. 5, and art. 5 (A) (2) and (3) are also substantially in the same form as the old article. In art. 5 (A) (4) is the departure that is relied on by the applicants as bringing in compulsory licences in respect of patents relating to food and medicine. As to that I would say that, while there is certainly a change of language, it is not the change one would expect if the intention had been to produce the particular result contended for. One would have expected, in my view, a reference to the varieties of compulsory licences, other than those which might be granted as a remedy for abuses, to which the article was directed. If compulsory licences of patents in respect of food and medicine, as to which there has been no abuse, were intended to be brought into the article, that has been done in a most obscure and devious fashion, and it must be remembered that some change of language was in any case required for the purpose of introducing the new two years' period of grace between the granting of the first compulsory licence and the institution of any proceedings for revocation.

Looking at the article as it stands in the 1934 form, the applicants rely on these matters. First, as to the view that the whole of the article relates to abuses, it is said that the word "abuses" and the phrase "abuse of monopoly rights" are vague and ambiguous expressions to which no precise meaning can be attached, and it is impossible, therefore, to relate art. 5 to matters of that kind, for that gives the article too uncertain and indefinite a field. With respect, I cannot accept that argument. The expression "abuse of monopoly rights"—and it is to abuses of that kind that the French equivalent word "abus" is obviously directed in this article—is an expression long used and well understood in patent matters. It means, in effect, conduct of the kind referred to in s. 37 of the Act of 1949. I see no reason why art. 5 should not be limited to matters of that kind. Article 5 (A) (2) shows with reasonable clarity what is meant by "abuses" by referring to "abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example, failure to work."

Secondly, great reliance is placed on the words "in any case". It is said that those words mean "in any case whatsoever", and that they, as it were, segregate para. (4) of the article from its other provisions and introduce a provision dealing with the grant of compulsory licences and the revocation of patents in any circumstances whatsoever, and in no way confined to cases of abuse of monopoly rights. I cannot accept that argument. In my view, the widest meaning one can give to "in any case" is "in any case of the kind dealt with by this article". That construction seems to me to be necessary in order to give the article any coherent effect. Thirdly, it is said that what is to be granted under art. 5 (A) (4) is "a compulsory licence", not "the compulsory licence", which one would expect if there were a reference back to compulsory licences of the kind mentioned in art. 5 (A) (3). In my view, there is nothing in that point and it is reasonably plain that the reference in art. 5 (A) (4) to "the grant of a compulsory licence" is a reference back to a compulsory licence granted with a view to preventing abuse of monopoly rights. Then it is sought to get over the significant phrase in art. 5 (A) (4), "if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons", by saying that the words "justify himself by legitimate reasons" do not suggest exculpation or the provision of some adequate excuse or, in the ordinary sense of the word, "justification" of some act or omission which might otherwise be considered worthy of blame. It is said that it can equally well refer to a patentee who has not done anything he ought not to have done, or omitted anything he ought to have done, but has simply obtained a patent relating to food or medicine. I cannot accept that argument. I think the words "if the patentee is unable to justify himself by legitimate reasons" strongly support the view that the whole of this article relates to measures to be taken to prevent an abuse of monopoly rights. I think the last sentence of art. 5 (A) (4) points to the same conclusion:

I think the revocation there intended to be referred to is clearly revocation on the ground of abuse, and that bears out the view that the reference to the first compulsory licence is a reference to a compulsory licence granted with a view to preventing abuse. Unless revocation is so limited there as opposed to being considered as a revocation of any kind on any ground and in any circumstances, it is difficult to see what effect should be given to it, for it cannot well be given a wholly unlimited meaning. If it were, one might find imported into art. 5 a reference even to revocation of the kind provided for in s. 32 of the Act of 1949, that is to say, revocation on the ground of invalidity, fraud, and so forth.

The point is one which is incapable of great elaboration, but, reading art. 5 of the 1934 convention as a whole, and giving the best consideration I can to the various indications as to its meaning to be extracted from the language used, it seems to me that it is reasonably plain that this article is referring simply to measures, whether by way of grant of compulsory licence or revocation, to prevent abuses of monopoly rights, and has no reference at all to the special provisions of the English legislation under which a compulsory licence may be granted in respect of substances capable of being used as food or medicine. As I have said, those provisions were formerly contained in s. 38A (2) of the 1907 Act and they are now to be found in s. 41 of the 1949 Act.

Since the case turns, as in my view it does, on the true construction of the convention, little assistance on that question of construction can be derived from the Patents Act, 1949. It is, however, to be observed that s. 37 of that Act, which is the section under which compulsory licences can be granted by reason of what I will still refer to as abuses of monopoly rights, says that no application for a compulsory licence can be made until after the expiration of three years from the date of the sealing of a patent. That clearly reflects the provisions of art. 5 of the convention. So, too, s. 40, which deals with endorsements, etc., on the application of the Crown, provides that applications may be made at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the sealing of the patent. Section 42, which enables patents to be revoked on the grounds specified in s. 37, that is to say, for abuses of monopoly rights, provides that the application may be made at any time after the expiration of two years from the date of an order granting a compulsory licence under s. 37. That, again, reflects the provisions of art. 5 of the convention. Section 41, which, as I have said, is the present section relating to compulsory licences in respect of patents for substances capable of being used as food or medicine, contains no time limit. The inference, for what it is worth, seems to be that this Act was prepared on the footing that the convention imposed no provision as to time which was relevant to the granting of compulsory licences under s. 41. That circumstance fortifies me in the conclusion to which I have come.

It is, of course, true that s. 45 (3) says:

“No order shall be made in pursuance of any application under ss. 37 to 42 of this Act which would be at variance with any treaty, convention, arrangement or engagement applying to the United Kingdom and any convention country”, and the inclusion of s. 41 in that provision is the foundation of the applicants' case, but they have also placed some reliance on this sub-section as an aid to the construction of art. 5 of the 1934 convention, for it is said that, by the very inclusion in its terms of s. 41, it suggests that the grant of a licence under s. 41 might be at variance with the convention, and that, if the reference to “any treaty, convention, arrangement or engagement” is to be treated as referring primarily to the existing convention of 1934, it suggests in effect that s. 41 is to be regarded as a section providing for the grant of compulsory licences within the meaning of art. 5 of the convention. As to that argument I would say that the expression in the Act (if there be such an expression) of an opinion to the effect that compulsory licences granted under s. 41 would, or might, come within the terms of art. 5 of the convention, cannot, in my view, affect the construction of art. 5. Further, I think there was some force in the respondents' argument to the effect that s. 45 (3) is satisfied if it is considered as referring, not merely to any existing convention, but to all such treaties, arrangements or engagements as may be made at any future time. I think the argument for the applicants based on s. 45 (3) is weakened by the circumstance that sub-s. (3) includes the whole fasciculus of ss. 37 to 42 and that ss. 37, 40 and 42 are all framed so as to conform, so far as can be seen, with the requirements of art. 5 of the convention, and yet the draftsman thought it necessary to include references to them in the provisions of s. 45 (3). That suggests that s. 45 (3) was inserted ex superabundanti cautela and not on account of any definite view taken as to the bearing of art. 5 of the convention on those sections. Therefore, for the reasons my Lord has given and such reasons as I have been able to add myself, I am of opinion that the Divisional Court came to a right conclusion in this case and that the appeal fails.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the determination of this appeal must depend on the interpretation and construction of art. 5 of the convention of 1934. The result of s. 45 (3) of the Act of 1949 must be that the Comptroller cannot make an order in pursuance of an application under s. 41 which would be at variance with any convention applying to the United Kingdom. The only convention to which reference is made by the applicants is the convention of 1934. It, therefore, becomes a question whether on the construction of the convention of 1934 the application pending before the Comptroller should not be heard for the reason that it is an application that cannot be entertained.

The applicants do not contend that after the convention of 1925 there was any time limit imposed as to compulsory licences referable to food and medicine.

When Parliament legislated in 1928 it is not suggested that they did not legislate on appropriate lines, but the argument for the applicants is that in the convention in 1934 a fundamental change was made by art. 5 (A) (4). It is said that the new language is clear and that it is too strong to permit of any limitation. If that is so, it must be observed that the clarity and the strength of the language entirely eluded the legislature and those who drafted a Bill to submit to the legislature, for when an Act was passed in 1938 to give effect to the convention of 1934 there was no time limit introduced referable to compulsory licences for food and medicine. On the applicants' submissions, therefore, it remained that from 1938 until 1949 the legislature, having set out to embody in English law the matters agreed by the convention, entirely failed to understand the language of the convention. If at a later date the full effect of the words had become apparent, I should have thought that in further legislation, and, particularly, in s. 41 of the Act of 1949, there would have been some express reference to the time limitation. But these points cannot in any way affect the court in construing the article.

The change that was introduced in 1934 was that the period of two years in reference to revocation was introduced. I read art. 5 (A) (1), (2), (3) and (4) exactly as SINGLETON, L.J., has read them, and I agree fully with the way in which he has interpreted them. [HIS LORDSHIP read art. 5 (A) (3) and continued:] There is, therefore, a reference to compulsory licences and also to revocation, which are "measures". Those measures, it seems to me, are clearly measures to prevent abuses. When, therefore, art. 5 (A) (4) begins:

"In any case, an application for the grant of a compulsory licence may not be made . . .",

I consider that the reference is to a compulsory licence of the same kind as the compulsory licence referred to in art. 5 (A) (3), that is to say, a compulsory licence which is a measure to prevent an abuse if the patentee is unable to justify himself. I am of the opinion that the opening words (which are only a translation of the French) in their context mean: "In any case of the kind contemplated by paras. (1), (2) and (3)", or that they might alternatively mean: "However that may be". I fully agree with the way in which this matter has been dealt with by my Lords, and I express my concurrence with the judgments delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

ELLIS v. HOME OFFICE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 8, 13, 14, 1953.]

Negligence—Prison authorities—Duty to prisoner—Protection against injury—Attack on prisoner by fellow prisoner.

Discovery—Production of documents—Privilege—"Disclosure . . . injurious to the public interest"—Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), s. 28 (1).

In July, 1949, while detained on remand in Winchester Prison, the plaintiff was put in the hospital wing of the prison as it was suspected that he was ill. At the same time H., a convicted prisoner who was thought to be mentally defective, was also in the hospital wing for observation. On the morning of July 22, owing to shortage of staff, there was only one prison officer on duty in the hospital wing instead of two. After opening the doors of some of the cells to allow the prisoners to empty their slops, he left the wing for a period. In his absence, H. went into the plaintiff's cell and hit him violently on the head. In an action against the Home Office for damages for the injuries he suffered thereby, the plaintiff based his claim on, inter alia, the negligence of the prison staff. For the prosecution of his case he asked for the production by the Home Office of certain documents, viz. (inter alia), medical reports on H., police reports at the time of the assault, and a deposition made at that time by another prisoner, but the Home Office refused to produce these documents on the ground that it would be injurious to the public interest to do so.

HELD: the common law duty owed by the prison authorities to the plaintiff was to take reasonable care for his safety, and, as there was no reason to think that H., though a mental defective, was more violent or dangerous than an ordinary prisoner, the conduct of the prison officer in leaving the hospital block, and in leaving the doors of the cells open so that H. had access to the plaintiff, could not have been reasonably expected to result in an attack being made by H. on the plaintiff, and, therefore, the Home Office were not liable to the plaintiff for negligence.

Per curiam: although it was essential that government departments should be entitled to claim privilege for documents the disclosure of which would be against the public interest, in the interests of justice the ambit of privilege should be carefully scrutinised, and in a case such as this each individual document should be examined before a claim of privilege was made and there should be disclosure and production of any documents which could not harm the public interest.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: "... where there is a large number of relevant documents within the ambit of privilege which may or may not become of real materiality to the case as it develops, there should be someone on the spot readily available—whether counsel or solicitor on the government side or an official from the department concerned—invested with authority to consider questions of privilege which may arise in the course of the case, and in his discretion to waive the claim of privilege. That, of course, would not apply to documents which from the outset appear to be such that they should on no account be disclosed for reasons of public interest."

Per MORRIS, L.J.: "... when considering the public interest and what might be 'injurious to the public interest', within the proviso to s. 28 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, it seems to me that it is to be remembered that one feature and one facet of the public interest is that justice should always be done and should be seen to be done."

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DEVLIN, J., made at Winchester Assizes, and dated Dec. 5, 1952.

On July 22, 1949, the plaintiff, while detained as a remand prisoner in Winchester Prison, was attacked in his cell and seriously injured by another prisoner, one Hammill, who had gained access to the cell while the prison officer was away for a short period. Hammill was a convicted prisoner who was thought to be mentally defective, and both he and the plaintiff were in the hospital block of the prison at the time of the assault. In an action against the Home Office the plaintiff claimed damages for the injuries suffered by him through, as he alleged, the negligence of persons employed by the Home Office, and, alternatively, he claimed damages for breach of the statutory duty which the Home Office owed to him under the Prison Rules, 1949, r. 92, r. 105, and r. 142. The claim at common law was based on the fact that Hammill was a mental defective, and it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that, by reason of that fact, a particular duty of care was laid on the prison authorities.

A DEVLIN, J., found that there was lack of proper supervision at the material time, but that there was no reason to anticipate any act of violence on the part of Hammill, and he held that the plaintiff had failed to establish negligence at common law. He further held that the injury did not result from a breach of the Prison Rules. As the material before him was incomplete owing to the fact that the defendants had refused to produce a number of documents on B the ground that it would be injurious to the public interest to do so, the learned judge expressed the view that, whether or not justice had been done, it certainly would not appear to have been done.

Scott Henderson, Q.C., and I. S. Hill for the plaintiff.

Diplock, Q.C., and Fay for the defendants.

C SINGLETON, L.J.: The plaintiff, who had been committed for trial, was in gaol in Her Majesty's prison at Winchester on July 22, 1949. As it was suspected that he had some illness, he was sent to No. C.2 wing, the hospital wing, of the prison, which has some thirty-eight cells. Two of them are used as places at which prisoners can empty their slops, and in the ordinary course they are allowed out of their cells at about 7 a.m. to do that. According to D the established practice, the officer in charge unlocks the doors of roughly one-quarter of the cells at a time, the doors of the other three-quarters remaining locked until those from the first quarter have emptied their slops. The cells were not all occupied on the morning of July 22, 1949. There were usually two prison officers on duty at this time of the morning, and one went down to the kitchen to get breakfast for the prisoners. On July 22, owing to shortage E of staff and to the fact that two officers were on leave, there was only one prison officer, one McHugh, in attendance. McHugh opened the doors of about half of the cells, and then left the wing for a period. While he was away, a prisoner named Hammill, who was the occupant of No. 25 cell, went into the plaintiff's cell, which was No. 6, and hit the plaintiff on the head at least two blows, apparently with some implement, but it was never found or identified. F If the ordinary practice had been followed, the door of No. 25 cell would not have been open at the same time as the door of No. 6, so that Hammill would not have been able to get into the plaintiff's cell. Hammill later pleaded Guilty to the offence of unlawfully wounding the plaintiff and was dealt with for that offence.

G Hammill had been in Canada for some years, and it is clear from the documents which are before the court that different courts in Canada had regarded him as being a mental case. When he returned to England, he committed an offence and was sent for trial. He was received into prison at Winchester in February, 1949, and appeared at the quarter sessions at Southampton in April. At the trial a police officer produced a report before the learned recorder which showed that Hammill might well be regarded as mentally defective.

H Dr. Fenton, the prison medical officer at Winchester, does not seem to have been aware of that fact, but when his attention was drawn to it at Southampton he agreed to consider the matter, and Hammill was put back for sentence at a later sessions. In view of what had been found, Dr. Fenton put Hammill into the C.2 wing, where he remained under observation from Apr. 19 until July 22. For some part of the period Dr. Fenton was away and another doctor had charge of the hospital patients, including Hammill. On July 22, 1949, the plaintiff should have appeared at the Assize Court at Winchester on the charge on which he had been committed for trial, but the injuries which he received that morning prevented his attendance there until December.

The plaintiff's claim against the Home Office was put on two grounds. In para. 4 of the statement of claim it is pleaded:

"The said injury was caused and brought about by the negligence of the defendants their servants or agents. Particulars of negligence. (i) The defendants, their servants or agents failed to exercise any or any adequate observation or supervision over the said convicted prisoner Hammill. (ii) They failed to segregate the said prisoner Hammill. (iii) They failed to keep the said prisoner Hammill, being a convicted prisoner, apart from the plaintiff, being an untried prisoner. (iv) They failed to take any or any adequate precautions to safeguard the plaintiff against the said prisoner, being a mental defective. (v) They failed to keep the said prisoner confined or detained in a place apart while he remained in the said prison. (vi) They failed to ensure that the said prisoner did not have access to implements for the purpose of striking the plaintiff."

It will be observed that the whole basis of the claim in regard to lack of supervision is lack of supervision of Hammill. I shall return to that later.

The further claim of the plaintiff is pleaded in para. 5 in this way:

"Further or alternatively by reason of the matters aforesaid the defendants their servants or agents were in breach of their statutory duty under r. 92, r. 105 and r. 142 of the Prison Rules, 1949, and the plaintiff will rely upon the particulars set out in para. 4 above."

The claim under para. 5, in so far as it was mentioned in this court, was based on the Prison Rules, 1949, r. 105, which falls under Part III, the heading to which is:

"Special rules for particular classes of prisoners other than those sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention. Untried prisoners."

Under the heading "General" in that Part is r. 105 which provides:

"Untried prisoners shall so far as possible be kept apart from convicted prisoners."

The reason for that rule is clear. It is, and for long it has been, the policy of those who are responsible for prison administration in this country to keep apart, as far as possible, convicted and unconvicted prisoners. It is recognised that, if a person has not been convicted, it is better that he should not be placed in danger of contamination from those who have been convicted. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that it was a breach of that rule which led to, or was a cause of, the injury which befell the plaintiff. I do not think that that is so. The fact was that on the morning of July 22, 1949, it was possible for Hammill to get into the plaintiff's cell, but the injury which was caused to the plaintiff did not result from the breach of the rule, and that claim fails.

In regard to the plaintiff's claim under para. 4 of the statement of claim, the case was pleaded on the supposition that a particular duty was laid on the prison authorities because of the fact that Hammill was a person who was mentally deficient, and, when the case was before DEVLIN, J., that was the way it was put before him. Witnesses were examined and cross-examined to show that Hammill was not up to the ordinary standard. It was said that his intelligence was not above that of a boy of seven or eight years of age, and it was, therefore, suggested that there was a higher duty on the prison authorities than there was in the case of someone who was not so afflicted. There was no evidence to show that Hammill had exhibited any sign of violence before July 22, 1949. There was evidence, which the learned judge accepted, that a person who is a mental defective is no more likely to use violence than one who is not. There was, indeed, no evidence to the contrary. DEVLIN, J., said:

A “ Mr. McKenna [who was then appearing as counsel for the defendants] contends that mere lack of supervision shows no breach of any duty towards the plaintiff. Mr. McHugh’s duty was to carry out the proper routine, i.e., his duty towards his superiors, his employers. But I am not concerned with that. What I am concerned with is his superiors’ or employers’ duty towards the plaintiff, and they do not owe any duty to the plaintiff to see that the warders carry out all their instructions properly. The duty that the prison authorities owe to the plaintiff is to take reasonable care for his safety, and it is only if Mr. McHugh neglected to do that that his employers, the prison authorities, may be made liable. The test of that is whether Mr. McHugh, when he left the landing . . . ought to have appreciated, as a foreseeable consequence to what he did, that an injury might be done to the plaintiff. I do not think that he ought, unless he knew, or his superiors knew—for that would be sufficient for the purpose—that Hammill was the sort of person who was likely, if he was allowed out of confinement, to commit an act of violence, and, therefore, had to be watched, not merely in his own interest and not merely as a matter of prison discipline, but in order that others might be protected from the foreseeable consequence of what he might do if left at large. Thus, the matter appears to me to turn on whether the prison authorities knew, or ought to have known, that Hammill was a prisoner who was likely, if not kept under control, to commit an act of violence. On that, the only evidence that I have is the evidence of the prison authorities themselves and of the prison doctor, Dr. Fenton, who said . . . that when he examined [Hammill] he did not think, he had no reason for thinking, that [Hammill] was likely to commit an act of violence. There is nothing in Hammill’s previous record which shows that he was likely to commit an act of violence. There is nothing—I accept the defendants’ evidence on this point—that makes a mental defective any more likely to commit an act of violence than a person who is in full possession of his powers of mind; that is, nothing in the bare fact of mental defectiveness. Of course, mental defectiveness may take that form, but if you take an average of the prison population, you will not find that mental defectives are any more violent than the average person in prison. Accordingly, on that evidence there would be no reason to anticipate any act of violence by Hammill, and no reason to keep any special observation, or take any special precautions with regard to him for that purpose . . . I have either to believe or disbelieve, on the material I have, Dr. Fenton’s evidence. I believe it, and in those circumstances the plaintiff, in my judgment, failed to make out any breach of common law duty.”

G It is the duty of this court to accept those findings of the learned judge. I go further and say that on the evidence, and on the case as pleaded, those findings are right and are sufficient to dispose of this appeal. It was submitted to this court by counsel for the plaintiff that the learned judge had taken too narrow a view of the position, and that he had to consider not only the case made in regard to Hammill, but the whole of the circumstances. Counsel said that the learned judge, on his findings, should have come to the conclusion that the defendants had failed in the duty which they owed to prisoners generally, of whom the plaintiff was one, and that the very thing happened which might be expected to happen if there was a lack of supervision. It was submitted that on those grounds the judgment of the learned judge should be reversed. I do not disguise from myself that a case of considerable weight was made on that line of reasoning. It was not the case pleaded, and it was not the case put to the learned judge. In his judgment, DEVLIN, J., speaking of the incident on the morning of July 22, said:

"In this case, therefore, I am not satisfied that Officer McHugh has given me a complete and true account of how this assault was committed. I am satisfied that he had his back turned for very much longer than he is willing to concede. What he was doing, I do not think very much matters on the facts so far as I am considering them at the moment. It is sufficient for me to find that there was a lack of the supervision which there ought to have been, and it was during that lack of supervision that the assault was committed. But I am bound to say that I cannot, in the circumstances, having rejected McHugh's evidence, accept a good deal of the plaintiff's evidence. I think the probability is that McHugh, being shorthanded and having a great deal of work to get through, had not followed the usual routine as it ought to have been followed, and had been tempted to hurry matters along by opening one or more of these sections at once so that, as the plaintiff says, Hammill and [the plaintiff] were both freed to use the recess and, to that extent, to move about the corridor at the same time. I am satisfied that the observation which ought to have been kept on the corridor to prevent that happening was not, at the material time, being kept. There was, therefore, I think—I do not at this stage say a breach of the rules, because that is a matter that I will have to consider later—a breach of duty by McHugh in relation to the tasks which he ought to have been carrying out."

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued:] There was ample material on which the learned judge could find that there was lack of supervision. The need for supervision is recognised. The unknown quantity is to be borne in mind, particularly when a number of persons are together under restraint and deprived of their liberty. The danger of someone having an instrument is appreciated. The danger may be danger to a prison officer, but if a man has access to an instrument, he may hit someone other than a prison officer, as happened in this case. The duty on those responsible for one of Her Majesty's prisons is to take reasonable care for the safety of those who are within, and that includes those who are within against their wish or will, of whom the plaintiff was one. If it is proved that supervision is lacking, and that accused persons have access to instruments, and that an incident occurs of a kind such as might be anticipated, I think it might well be said that those who are responsible for the good government of the prison have failed to take reasonable care for the safety of those under their care.

DEVLIN, J., felt grave concern about this case from another point of view. In his judgment he said:

The plaintiff is in the unfortunate position that he has been quite unable to test that evidence [in regard to Hammill] in any way at all. The facts relating to Hammill's behaviour in prison are known only to the prison authorities. Documents, of course, are brought into existence in relation to that. The hospital officers prepare a daily report in which, of course, it would be their business to note down anything with regard to Hammill which was significant, because he was put in the C.2 wing in mental hospital that he might be kept under observation. Those reports, if they were shown, might or might not show something which would lead a medical man to suppose that Hammill's conduct ought to have given rise to a finding of his intelligent violence. Those reports are not before the court because the prison authorities, and it was, therefore, also the Crown—have claimed Crown privilege. There was no evidence to the contrary, and that claim has not been challenged. Having regard to the fact that there was no evidence to the contrary, I suppose it could not be said before July 22, 1949. I, therefore, have to look at the case on the material that a person who is in a position to have to regard this case in precisely the same position as if the documents which would have enabled the plaintiff to test the evidence of the defendants' witnesses had been destroyed. That would be a misfortune which he would have to put up with as best he could, but it is, of course, a worse misfortune than that, because, not merely are the documents to be regarded as having been destroyed, but no secondary evidence can be given of their contents, so that they must be treated, therefore, as being obliterated from everyone's memory. But that is what the law requires, and in those circumstances I can only act on the evidence which I have got. I must not assume that anything that is contained in the documents would have caused Dr. Fenton under cross-examination to alter his opinion or would have enabled the plaintiff to throw another light on the matter."

B Having stated his conclusion, the learned judge said this:

"But before I leave this case I must express, as I have expressed during the hearing of the case, my uneasy feeling that justice may not have been done because the material before me was not complete, and something more than an uneasy feeling that, whether justice has been done or not, it certainly will not appear to have been done."

That is a serious thing for a judge to have to say as to the administration of justice in his court. DEVLIN, J., continued:

"This case . . . turns entirely on the cardinal fact whether the prison doctor had any reason to believe that Hammill, a mental defective, was likely to commit violence. There is no doubt that daily reports would have been prepared by the hospital orderlies, while Hammill was confined for some considerable time in the hospital wing, recording anything that was material about him. Dr. Fenton has, no doubt, examined those records, and, well, we do not know what they are. I have no reason at all to suppose, and it has not been suggested, that he has expressed an opinion—that is, has knowingly expressed an opinion—which is inconsistent with those records, but it does mean that his opinion cannot be tested in cross-examination in the way in which it ordinarily is tested. There may, for example, be incidents recorded which Dr. Fenton has regarded as of no significance, and which another doctor might have considered of significance, and, had there been a conflict of medical evidence on the point, it might be that I would have preferred that other doctor's evidence to that of Dr. Fenton . . . It is a rule, of course, which is particularly unfortunate when the person, who is responsible for deciding whether they should be disclosed or not, happens also to be the defendant in the action in which he is being sued. It means that every litigant against a government department—and such litigation is becoming more and more frequent as the sphere of government activities is extended—is denied, as a matter of course, the elementary right of checking the evidence of government witnesses against the contemporary documents. Dr. Fenton, for example, made an examination of the prisoner, Hammill, in June, and he prepared, I am told . . . case notes, which, of course, in the ordinary case the plaintiff would want to look at so as to check his evidence. They come among the documents that are privileged from disclosure, as has all the material to which I have already referred, the reports which were made by the hospital officers in the C.2 wing."

H

Thus, we have the trial judge left with a feeling of dissatisfaction, and that is not as it should be. Over and above the reports on Hammill for which privilege was claimed, a further claim of privilege was made in respect of a report submitted on June 22, 1950, to the Chief Constable of Hampshire: "Statements of witnesses and photographs taken by the Hampshire Constabulary, July 22 to Aug. 5, 1949". The Secretary of State had sworn an affidavit in which he deposed to the fact that the standing orders for the government of prisons, included in the third part of the first schedule of documents, were documents in respect of which he claimed privilege, he having formed the view on the grounds of public interest that those standing orders ought not to be produced. No one, I am sure, will say a word against that claim. It is of great importance that privilege should be maintained when the public interest is at stake. Some time after that affidavit had been put on the file, the Treasury Solicitor wrote to the solicitor for the plaintiff asking if an affidavit was required in respect of other documents for which privilege was claimed, and there were many of them. I have referred to two classes: (i) the reports on Hammill, and (ii) police reports. The solicitor for the plaintiff did not require another affidavit. I am inclined to think that, if a further affidavit had been required, more thought would have been given to this matter than appears to have been given at one stage. Everyone agrees that a government department, particularly the Home Office, is charged with a multiplicity of duties, and its officers must have possession of numbers of documents production of which would be against the public interest.

But let me consider the police documents in this case for a moment. It was 3.50 p.m. on July 22, 1949, when the police were called in. I have no doubt that they took a number of statements from people who might be witnesses. I have no doubt that they searched. I have no means of knowing what they found. I should assume that they found nothing, but the judge at the trial might have been helped if he had had before him the result of the police inquiries when they were called in in this matter. Counsel for the plaintiff did not go fully into the question of police documents. Apparently, it was thought that they were covered by the claim of privilege. But there happened a peculiar incident on the first day of the trial, when a witness named Hutton, another prisoner in C.2 wing, gave evidence. He gave his account of what happened three and a half years earlier. In cross-examination by counsel for the defendants, he was asked about the deposition which he had made at the time that Hammill was committed for trial. Part of his deposition was read to him. He was asked by counsel for the defendants:

"Q.—That is very different, is it not, from the evidence that you have given today? A.—In regards to that it is a long time really, to go back in regards to this part here, because this evidence I gave happened to be on the spot of a matter of twelve hours, when that evidence was given. The evidence I have given now is three and a half years. It is a long time to look into the case as regards evidence in between now.

Q.—You think that you may have forgotten really what happened? A.—That is really what I am trying to explain with regard to that. That is twelve hours old. Not twelve hours, because I was testified by the police there that same day, that same evening between the hours of six o'clock and eight o'clock at night, whereas this evidence is three and a half years old. It is a long time to go back."

Counsel for the defendants then proceeded to ask Hutton about a statement which he had made to some solicitors for the purpose of this case. He read the statement to him and Hutton said that he had made it. Neither the deposition nor the statement was in complete accord with what Hutton said in his evidence-in-chief, and the cross-examination was intended to cast doubt on him and on the worth of his evidence. He said:

"But I gave an account twelve hours afterwards. I testified twelve hours afterwards."

Accordingly, counsel for the plaintiff asked him in re-examination:

"Q.—You say that that very day you made a statement to the police officer? A.—Which one do you mean?"

Q.—Did you see the police after [the plaintiff] had been attacked ?
A.—You mean 1949 ?

Q.—Yes. A.—I was brought out by one of the officers, I believe, to see a detective in the prison in one of the cells there to give this evidence.

Q.—Did he take down in writing what you said ? Did you sign a statement at that time ? A.—I do not know that I can remember. It is a long time to go back to, to three and a half years. Mr. Scott Henderson (for the plaintiff): I call for this witness's statement, if there is one. Mr. McKenna (for the defendants): My Lord, I believe that a claim of privilege has been made for the statements that were made at this time, on the ground that those statements were taken in circumstances where the Crown does not disclose the statements that were made. But I am sorry that the claim has been made, because one would like the document to be produced at once to my learned friend."

After a discussion, counsel for the plaintiff said that he would not pursue it lest it should cause difficulty with the Home Office—I forget the exact words—and that statement was not before the learned judge. Objection was taken to its production on the ground of privilege.

The judge did not form a very good view of the evidence of Hutton. I am not sure that he would have formed any better view if he had seen the statement which counsel for the plaintiff called for. But I am surprised that objection was taken. I cannot conceive that it served any good purpose. I do not intend this as criticism of anyone, for I know that the law in regard to privilege is not always easy to follow. But if there be two statements—the deposition and the later statement made not long before this trial—on which a witness for the plaintiff is cross-examined, and if he himself says: "I testified twelve hours after the happening", if he wants to see that to refresh his memory, and if counsel for the plaintiff wants the witness and the judge to see it, I have no doubt whatever in my mind that it ought to be produced. If it is not, the judge is not in as good a position to form a view on the witness as he would be if he had seen it. I go further, and I say that the administration of the law will become impossible if that attitude is adopted. Counsel for the defendants thought it his duty to draw attention to the fact that this was one of the documents for which privilege was claimed. If a position such as that arises, it ought, I think, to be clear to counsel on both sides that it is impossible for justice to appear to be done if a witness who wants to see his statement made twelve hours after the occurrence is not allowed to have it.

I wondered what the result might have been, and, therefore, today, after consultation with the other members of the court, I asked counsel for the defendants how long it would take him to get the necessary authority to show the document to counsel for the plaintiff. Counsel for the defendants said that it might take a little time, so the court adjourned. It appeared that this had not been considered. In the case of a claim of privilege made on behalf of the Home Office, we are told that the senior permanent official of the department has seen every document. After the adjournment counsel for the defendants obtained the consent which he regarded as sufficient to allow him to show the document to counsel for the plaintiff, and it was shown. There is nothing in it. We all thought that there might not be. I assume that counsel who appeared for the defendants at the trial had not seen it. There was no reason why it should not have been produced, nothing which could affect the public interest in any degree. I suppose that, if the claim of privilege is made in these wide terms, it may be difficult for counsel, but I think that the document should have been produced. A good deal of time would have been saved, and some of the anxiety of the learned judge would have been saved. That is one document. There are others resulting from the police inquiries generally. I do not think that any harm would be done to the public interest by allowing the plaintiff in a case such as this to see the result of the police inquiries or—if it is not thought right that he should have the original statements, or copies of them—to let him have what junior counsel for the defendants described as an abstract. It is true that an abstract was not asked for because the plaintiff's solicitor regarded himself as faced with the claim of privilege.

The major claim of privilege covered documents which were in the nature of reports on the prisoner Hammill. I have not seen those reports, and I ought not to express an opinion on them, but one thing that the courts in this country have sought to make clear, generation after generation, is that there ought to be fair play. I know that the responsible officials in the Home Office desire that, but the danger is that, if a claim of privilege is made in the wide terms in which it was made in this case, it prevents anything being shown, and so one side has all the advantages and the other side is deprived of something which it might have without any danger whatever to the public weal.

This was an anxious and troublesome case. The plaintiff was a man awaiting trial who suffered a grievous injury. The desire of every court, above all things, is that every litigant should have a fair chance and appear to have a fair chance. If DEVLIN, J., at the end of this case had an unsatisfactory feeling, the position was not such as every judge and every good citizen likes it to be. Let me make clear that I am not saying there was the slightest desire on the part of anyone in the Home Office to be unfair in any sense of the word. I know that it is not so. The danger is the wide claim of privilege without consideration of individual documents. The matter was dealt with in the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. (1). The law then was not quite the same as it is now because of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, which has been passed since, though that, in effect, only reproduces the practice. Section 28 of the Act of 1947 provides:

“(1) Subject to and in accordance with rules of court and county court rules:—(a) in any civil proceedings in the High Court or a county court to which the Crown is a party, the Crown may be required by the court to make discovery of documents and produce documents for inspection . . .”

Until that time the Crown was not bound to give discovery.

“. . . (b) in any such proceedings as aforesaid, the Crown may be required by the court to answer interrogatories: Provided that this section shall be without prejudice to any rule of law which authorises or requires the withholding of any document or the refusal to answer any question on the ground that the disclosure of the document or the answering of the question would be injurious to the public interest. Any order of the court made under the powers conferred by para. (b) of this sub-section shall direct by what officer of the Crown the interrogatories are to be answered. (2) Without prejudice to the proviso to the preceding sub-section, any rules made for the purposes of this section shall be such as to secure that the existence of a document will not be disclosed if, in the opinion of a Minister of the Crown, it would be injurious to the public interest to disclose the existence thereof.”

It is clear that the public interest is that which counts. In Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. (1) it was shown that the claim by the responsible Minister for privilege for documents might be put on two grounds. VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 592):

“This test may be found to be satisfied either (a) by having regard to the contents of the particular document or (b) by the fact that the document belongs to a class which, on grounds of public interest, must as a class be withheld from production.”

And so it is said here by counsel for the defendants that both these classes of documents belong to a class which, on the ground of public interest, “must as a class be withheld from production". This case shows how wide an interpretation may be put on the words of VISCOUNT SIMON. It seems to me that it is desirable in a case such as this that there should be disclosure and production of documents which cannot harm the public interest, and that each individual document should be examined before a claim of privilege is made.

A VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., cited (ibid., 594) Admiralty Commissioners v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling & Fishing Co. (2) and the words of LORD DUNEDIN, Lord President, where he said (1909 S.C. 340):

"It seems to me that if a public department comes forward and says that the production of a document is detrimental to the public service, it is a very strong step indeed for the court to overrule that statement by the department."

B Here the plaintiff's advisers were faced with a claim that both classes of documents to which I have referred were of a kind which it would be injurious to the public interest to produce, and they were not produced. Earlier in his speech VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 591):

C "Where the Crown is a party to a suit, therefore, discovery of documents cannot be demanded from it as a right, though in practice, for reasons of fairness and in the interests of justice, all proper disclosure and production would be made."

I cannot help feeling that, if this question had been considered in all its implications, both in regard to police documents and in regard to hospital reports, it might well have been found that the disclosure of most of them could not have been fraught with any danger to the public interest, while it would have been desirable that they should be disclosed to the advisers of the injured plaintiff for reasons of fairness and in the interests of justice. I have taken some little time to express my opinion in a case which is not without importance. If it be necessary every time a document is required by the plaintiff—such as the document in Hutton's case—that a request has to be made to the Secretary of State or the permanent head of the department for that document, endless delay will be caused in litigation. I cannot believe that it was necessary, for the reasons which I have given, and, above all, because the witness who had made the statement wanted to see it to refresh his memory in order to see how far counsel was right or wrong in suggesting that his memory was unreliable. I cannot see any reason why that document should not have been produced. For the reasons that I have given I feel that this court can only say that, on the findings of the learned judge, the appeal must be dismissed.

H JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. I confess to great sympathy for the plaintiff who, while detained as a remand prisoner in Her Majesty's prison at Winchester, was the victim of a brutal, and, apparently, entirely unprovoked, attack by a fellow prisoner, Hammill, from which he sustained serious injuries. But the mere fact that the plaintiff while in prison was attacked and injured by a fellow prisoner does not entitle him to succeed against the government department responsible for the management of the prison, i.e., the Home Office. He must show that the injury which he sustained was due to some breach of duty on the part of those responsible for the management of the prison. This it has been sought to do in two ways. First, it is said that the injury was caused and brought about by the negligence of the defendants, their servants or agents. Secondly, it is said that the injury arose from breach of the defendants' statutory duty under certain rules of the Prison Rules, 1949. I entirely agree with the learned judge that the claim based on breach of the Prison Rules will not stand.

There remains the claim for negligence at common law. That claim was pleaded solely on the footing that the defendants knew or ought to have known that Hammill was a man of violent propensities, i.e., a person who might be expected at any moment to make a violent and unprovoked attack on a fellow prisoner. The learned judge, having heard the evidence, and having seen the witnesses (and in particular having heard the evidence of the prison medical officer, Dr. Fenton) found, in effect, that, although, admittedly, Hammill was a mental defective, there were no circumstances in his history as then known, and no symptoms of his insanity then observable by reason of which the prison authorities either knew or ought to have known that he was any more violent or dangerous than an ordinary prisoner. In my view, on that finding of fact this claim must fail, and it would be wrong for us sitting in appeal to disturb the conclusion of the learned judge. He held (and, indeed, it was not in dispute) that the common law duty owed by the prison authorities to the plaintiff as an inmate of Winchester Prison was to take reasonable care for the safety of the plaintiff as a person in the custody of the prison authorities. The finding of the learned judge as to what the defendants knew or ought to have known in regard to Hammill's state of mind and his probable conduct absolved the defendants from taking any special precautions to prevent Hammill having access to other prisoners. Once the need for special vigilance based on actual or imputed knowledge of Hammill's dangerous abnormality is out of the way, in my view (though I regard the case as near the line), the conduct of the prison officer, McHugh, in leaving the C.2 block during the period of the slopping-out operation without locking up all the cells, and, in particular, in leaving Hammill's cell door open and the plaintiff's cell door open so that Hammill could have access to the plaintiff, irregular though it may have been, and remiss though McHugh may have been in thus absenting himself, could not have been reasonably expected to result in an attack being made by Hammill on the plaintiff, or (to view the matter more generally) in an attack being made by one or other of the prisoners on one or other of his fellow prisoners, the victim as it happened turning out to be the plaintiff, with Hammill as the aggressor.

To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, be placing too high a duty of care on the prison authorities. It would be a duty comparable to that which I would expect to be laid on authorities in charge of an institution for the reception of dangerous lunatics. When the task is to supervise people of that sort, it may very well be that it is negligent to leave them unsupervised even for an instant, but I do not think it would be right or reasonable to hold that there is any comparable risk of violent conduct amongst the ordinary run of prisoners such as those who were in the C.2 block on the day of this incident. I cannot leave this part of the case without adding that I agree with my Lord that, although the plaintiff has not succeeded in fixing the defendants with liability in the particular circumstances of this case, the evidence can hardly be said to have shown that the administration of the prison at the date in question was all that it should have been. No doubt, the authorities have their difficulties in the way of finding suitable staff, and so on, but I cannot regard the course of events on that day as reflecting any credit on the people in charge.

On the question of privileged documents to which my Lord has referred, I would only add this. It is clearly essential in the public interest that responsible government departments should be entitled to claim privilege for documents the disclosure of which would be against the public interest, and it is clearly right that the decision of the responsible Minister on the question whether privilege should be insisted on or not in respect of any particular document should be final. But I would urge that in the interests of justice—particularly in a case like the present, which concerns a claim of one of Her Majesty's subjects against a government department—documents within the ambit of privilege should be most carefully scrutinised, and the person entrusted with that task should, in regard to each document, ask himself whether it is relevant to the plaintiff's case, whether the plaintiff's case will be hampered or impeded if it is not made available, and, if so, whether the probability of any harm being done to the public interest by disclosing it is sufficient to out-weigh those other considerations. I also think that in a case of this sort, where there is a large number of relevant documents within the ambit of privilege which may or may not become of real materiality to the case as it develops, there should be someone on the spot readily available—whether counsel or solicitor on the government side or an official from the department concerned—invested with authority to consider questions of privilege which may arise in the course of the case, and in his discretion to waive the claim of privilege. That, of course, would not apply to documents which from the outset appear to be such that they should on no account be disclosed for reasons of public interest. But in the case of ordinary documents (such as those in question in the present case) the disclosure of which could not, apparently, do any harm to anybody, I certainly think that it should be possible for the question to be disposed of in the course of the trial of an action without the delay imposed by reference back to the Minister. I agree with my Lord that the appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I have reached the same conclusion. I consider that the learned judge applied the appropriate test in regard to the evidence that was before him. He posed the question whether it had been shown that the defendants had failed to take reasonable care in regard to the plaintiff. It appears to me that, if there had been in the vicinity of the plaintiff in this prison someone who was likely, unless prevented or unless supervised, to offer violence to someone else, then it would be the duty of the prison authorities to see that such a potentially dangerous person did not have opportunity to do harm. On the evidence that was before the learned judge, I think that he was obliged to come to the conclusion that the case was not established to his satisfaction. It was not shown that the prison authorities had reasonable cause to think that Hammill was potentially violent, nor, in my judgment, was it shown that they had reasonable cause to think that there was any implement left in the prison which might be a temptation or be within the reach of someone who might use it to commit an act of violence. I, therefore, agree with the judgments that have been delivered.

I would add that I fully agree with what has been said in regard to the great importance of the duties which devolve on Ministers of the Crown when they have to consider the subject of privilege. At such times, as Ministers of the Crown and as servants of the public, they have to do their best to secure the interests of the public. In his speech in Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. (1), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., used these words ([1942] 1 All E.R. 595):

“After all, the public interest is also the interest of every subject of the realm, and while, in these exceptional cases, the private citizen may seem to be denied what is to his immediate advantage, he, like the rest of us, would suffer if the needs of protecting the interests of the country as a whole were not ranked as a prior obligation.”

But when considering the public interest and what might be “injurious to the public interest”, within the proviso to s. 28 (1) of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, it seems to me that it is to be remembered that one feature and one facet of the public interest is that justice should always be done and should be seen to be done. It is, indeed, unfortunate in any case—unless considerations of public interest when weighed in the balance demand it—if it should appear that any document which might conceivably have assisted a party to the litigation should not be available. A Minister has the anxious and arduous and responsible task of deciding whether disclosure would be against the public interest. When he decides, his decision is final. But it is, I think, one element of the public interest that regard should be had to the due administration of justice in such manner that it should always be done, and should be seen to be done.

Appeal dismissed.

MORGAN v. TATE & LYLE, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 18, 19, 20, May 5, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Expenditure on campaign against proposal to nationalise industry—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

To protect the company's business and assets from loss through the nationalisation of the industry in general and of its concern in particular, of which its directors believed there was a serious risk in certain political eventualities, a sugar refining company expended £15,339 on an anti-nationalisation campaign, including advertising, film making, film showing, the issue of pamphlets and ration-book holders (suitably inscribed), photography and recordings.

HELD (SINGLETON, L.J., dissentiente): the expenditure was incurred for the purpose of preventing the company from being disabled from carrying on its trade: dictum of LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield ([1906] A.C. 453) and Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce ([1915] A.C. 433) applied; and of protecting the business and assets of the company, and not in part to prevent the transfer of the right to receive the profits earned through the trade: Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 531), and Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland ([1948] 2 All E.R. 367), distinguished; nor was the expenditure contrary to ordinary principles of commercial accounting, or concerned with something more than the company's undertaking because it related to the whole industry, since such a campaign could not be conducted in favour of one concern in the industry; and, therefore, the expenditure capable of being held to have been "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade" of the company within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and so to be deductible in arriving at the company's profits under the schedule.

Semble, the expenditure was not of a capital nature.

APPEAL from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Dec. 18, 1952, dismissing the Crown's appeal by Case Stated from a decision of the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London.

D The respondent company, the taxpayers, appealed against an assessment to income tax under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year ending Apr. 5, 1951, in the sum of £2,200,000 less £100,000 capital allowances, on the ground that certain expenditure incurred in carrying out a propaganda campaign was deductible in computing the profits of the company. The

E expenditure, amounting to £15,339 15s. 2d., was incurred through an agent of the company, Aims of Industry, Ltd., whose activities included advertising film making, film showing, the issue of pamphlets and ration-book holders (suitably inscribed), photography, and recordings. The campaign was directed against the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry, in which the company

F was engaged, which was being advocated by the Labour Party and was included in the policy statement submitted to the party's annual conference in 1949, and which the directors of the company believed would result if the party was returned to power as the government at the general election, 1950. The company contended that the expenditure incurred in carrying out the propaganda campaign was for the sole purpose of preserving its business and assets and thereby enabling it to carry on its business, and that it was, therefore, money

G wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade and was a permissible deduction from profits for income tax purposes. It said further that that position was not affected by the fact that the expenditure might have benefited to some extent the sugar refining industry as a whole or the stockholders of the company and that the ultimate form of nationalisation was immaterial. The

H Crown contended that the expenditure was made, not for the purpose of earning profits in the company's trade, but for the extraneous purpose of conducting a propaganda campaign against nationalisation of the sugar industry as a whole; that that campaign was for the dual purpose of (i) preventing the acquisition of the assets and business of the company by a national body and (ii) preventing the acquisition of the company's capital stock by a national body, depending on the particular form of nationalisation which might be adopted by the government; that in so far as the propaganda campaign was to prevent the form of nationalisation by which the assets and business would be compulsorily acquired by a national body, the expenditure was not incurred directly for the earning of profits in the trade, but was the cost of conducting a campaign to decide who should earn the profits—the company or the State; that expenditure to protect the ownership of the company's capital stock was not expenditure connected with the company's trade; and, therefore, that the expenditure was not money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade and was not deductible. The commissioners held that the sum was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade and was an admissible deduction from its profits for income tax purposes, and dismissed the Crown's appeal. HARMAN, J., dismissed the Crown's appeal against that decision. The Crown appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: During the year 1949 there were proposals for the extension of nationalisation to certain industries of which sugar refining was one. The position is shown in many documents exhibited to the Case, one of which was published in April, 1949, on the authority of the national executive committee of the Labour Party, which at that time provided the government of the country. It is a book of some thirty pages entitled "Labour Believes in Britain", and it was for consideration at the annual conference of the Labour Party at Whitsuntide, 1949. It contained this passage:

"The Sugar Monopoly. The privately owned British Sugar Corporation, Ltd., with a monopoly in sugar beet manufacture, was set up by a Conservative government. The legislation creating the monopoly will expire early in the next Parliament. Labour will not leave this monopoly in private ownership. Sugar refining is also controlled by a State-protected private monopoly which has enabled large profits to be made for private shareholders. One concern dominates the British sugar industry; it also has large interests in some of the colonial territories which the Labour government is pledged to develop. The sugar industry is vital both in war and peace. Labour intends to transfer to public ownership all the sugar manufacturing and refining concerns."

The company, the taxpayers in the present case, refines roughly fifty-three per cent. of all the sugar refined in this country. It has an issued capital of over £8,000,000. The directors of the company became convinced that the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry would become part of the Labour Party's official programme, and they were satisfied that the company was the "one concern" referred to in the extract set out above. They decided to take every legitimate step to oppose this. The president of the company is Lord Lyle of Westbourne. One of the documents attached to the Case, entitled "No appeasement", reproduces two of his speeches along with this note:

"In the fight against nationalisation of sugar refining, Lord Lyle, president of Tate & Lyle, Ltd., has made it clear that he and his board will oppose this step with every weapon at their command. The two recent speeches made by Lord Lyle to his shareholders caused world-wide interest. They are, therefore, reproduced here in full."

These speeches are strong indictments of nationalisation in general and bring forward substantial reasons against the proposal for nationalisation of the sugar refining industry in particular.

As, according to the Case, they were used in the propaganda campaign which followed, I think it right to set out passages from each.

From the first:

"The consumer under free enterprise is protected against unjustified price increases by the guarantees that refiners have given to Chancellors of the Exchequer, by potential competition with foreign white sugar, and by the course open to manufacturers to conduct their own refining operations.

- A Where would these safeguards be under a State monopoly? I do not hesitate to forecast that they would all go by the board. Competition would no longer keep a check on prices. Rising costs would be followed by a cut in quality, a restriction of choice, and a curtailment of services to the consumer. The workers of your company enjoy the highest wages and best working conditions in the industry. They have a pride in the company which they serve and we who are on the board are proud to serve with them. Can you imagine that the same spirit would exist under the remote control of bureaucracy? I believe that with the standardisation that goes hand in hand with bureaucracy the best they can hope for is a standstill in wages and working conditions while other sections of the industry catch up."

- C From the second:

"What is so disturbing, if I may be allowed for a moment to take a wider view, is the effect that the nationalisation of sugar refining will have on other efficient industries. The undisclosed motives for nationalising sugar refining can apply equally to any industry which is efficiently run and is making profits. The managements of such companies will be subjected to a war of nerves, and will be continually looking over their shoulders. When will the nationalists be wanting them? When will the boys be looking for new jobs? When will their profits be wanted to offset the growing losses of the industries nationalised the year before? Some industries, to quote the planners, have sinned by making 'a high profit'. When they begin to lose millions a year of the taxpayers' money, doubtless the planners will be satisfied and will then look about them for new victims. I have spoken at some length to ensure that you realise what we are up against. You will appreciate from the way I have spoken how important I consider it that the public should be kept informed of the plans of the nationalists. You will have noticed that since they were given the 'all clear' at Blackpool, they have made no further mention of their plans. The last thing that they want is for the public to know the facts. It is plainly our duty to supply them."

One or other of these speeches was made at an extraordinary meeting of stockholders of the company held on Sept. 15, 1949, at which the following resolution was passed:

- G "Believing as we do that nothing but harm to workers, consumers and stockholders alike can spring from the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry, the members of this company hereby empower the board of directors to do everything in their power to meet the threats of the nationalists who, learning nothing from the chaos, losses and labour unrest that they have created in other industries, now wish to seize the assets of this company . . ."

Before this time—indeed before the Labour Party conference of 1949—the company had on Mar. 31, 1949, entered into an agreement with a company known as Aims of Industry, Ltd. By this agreement, after reciting that the company was desirous of fostering and promoting the interests of the industry of sugar refining with the ultimate view of the preservation and extension of the goodwill of the company's business, Aims of Industry, Ltd., was appointed the company's public relations officer and advertising agent for a period of five years at a fee of £5,000 per annum. Under cl. 2 of the said agreement, Aims of Industry, Ltd., undertook to use its best endeavours to foster and promote the interests of the said industry generally and to that end to seek to extend and develop the knowledge and information of the public generally in relation to the said industry, its processes, difficulties and achievements and its relation to the national economy, and it was provided further that nothing in the agreement contained should be deemed to impose on Aims of Industry, Ltd., any obligation to advertise the business of the company other than as a member of the said industry. It was also agreed that the company should place to the credit of a joint account (to be opened with Lloyds Bank, Ltd.) a sum of £75,000 for the purpose of meeting all expenditure recommended by Aims of Industry, Ltd., and approved by the company for furthering the aims and objects of the agreement. A

In fulfilment of the obligation imposed on them by the resolution referred to in an earlier paragraph, the directors decided to intensify their anti-nationalisation propaganda campaign, which was of national dimensions and which was in the hands of Aims of Industry, Ltd., in order to try to preserve the business and assets of the company intact. During the company's accounting year up to Oct. 1, 1949, Aims of Industry, Ltd., expended £29,398 5s. out of the £75,000 deposited with it. This sum of £29,398 5s. was entered in the company's profit and loss account for the fifty-two weeks ended Oct. 1, 1949, being included in an item of £42,183 for "advertising (including anti-nationalisation campaign)". In the accounts attached to this Case the item of £29,398 5s. is shown under central administration expenses. (There is another item for advertising, £12,785 1s. 2d., shown under selling expenses.) The activities of Aims of Industry, Ltd., included advertising, film making, film showing, the issue of pamphlets and ration-book holders (suitably inscribed), photography, recording, etc. There has been made a suggested allocation to show how the £29,398 5s. was spent. This is not a final division, but it provides a convenient way of looking at this case. It is: (1) General advertising £11,508 4s. 10d. (2) Anti-nationalisation (specific) £15,339 15s. 2d. (3) General £2,550 5s. 0d., totalling £29,398 5s. 0d. The company claims to deduct the whole of this sum, namely, £29,398 5s. in arriving at the balance of profits for the accounting period. The inspector of taxes contended, and still contends, that part of that sum, namely, £15,339 15s. 2d. is not a proper deduction. That is the dispute between the parties to this appeal. The general commissioners for the city of London set out the facts in the Case and state their conclusion in this way: B C D

"The commissioners found that the sum in question was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade and was an admissible deduction from its profits for income tax purposes." E

HARMAN, J., on appeal, was of opinion that the commissioners came to a right conclusion. The inspector of taxes appeals to this court. F

The question which has to be determined cannot be treated as merely a question of fact for the determination of the commissioners. In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1) LORD REID said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 535): G

"But it is, in my judgment, a question of law whether particular payments are of a nature capable of coming within the exception, and that is the issue here." H

Section 1 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides that the tax shall be charged in respect of all property, profits, or gains respectively described or comprised in the schedules and in accordance with the rules respectively applicable to those schedules. This case falls under sched. D and the rules to be considered are the Rule Applicable to Case I:

"The tax shall extend to every trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere . . . and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains . . .”, and r. 1 (1) and r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. Rule 1 (1) is:

“The tax shall be charged without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed”,

and r. 3 reads:

“In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade . . .”

It is really on the application of this last r. 3 (a) to the facts of this case that the determination of the appeal depends. I paraphrase it: “No sum shall be deducted unless it is a disbursement wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the trade.” Can it be said that the sum of £15,339 15s. 2d., expressed as expenditure on “anti-nationalisation (specific)”, was money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade?

C

Now, before stating their conclusion, the commissioners set out their findings of fact, and they say that they accepted the evidence of the three witnesses who were called before them. It is right that I should read the commissioners’ record of the evidence of Lord Lyle and of Mr. Booth, then secretary and now a director of the company. Lord Lyle said:

D

“He had been a director of the company for forty years. He was intimately acquainted with the whole of the sugar refining industry. The directors thought that, if nationalisation occurred, the State would take over the company’s assets and its business, and they decided that they would take such legal steps as they could to try to prevent this. The primary object of the propaganda campaign was to prevent the company from losing its business and to preserve its assets intact. He agreed that if the company lost its business the stockholders would also suffer and he also agreed that the preservation of the company’s business would, incidentally, save the stockholders from injury as well. He had never thought of the alternative method of nationalisation by which the State would have acquired all the capital stock of the company from its members. The directors’ intention was to protect the company—in so doing no doubt they protected the stockholders also; it would be their duty to protect them as well.”

Mr. Booth said:

“A good deal of the propaganda employed in the campaign was directed towards defending the industry as a whole, although the whole of the expenditure was incurred by the company. It would have been no use having a propaganda campaign to prevent the company alone being nationalised; only by campaigning against the nationalisation of the industry as a whole would the company’s own business be saved. Aims of Industry, Ltd., was looking after the company’s interests through the industry as a whole. It did occur to him that one way of nationalising the company would be for the State to acquire all the capital stock, but they had no right to assume which form nationalisation would take. There was a danger that it would take various forms, but they could only assume the worst and do their best to protect their own business. They were anxious to prevent nationalisation from taking place in any form.”

H

No one questions the right of the company to oppose nationalisation of the sugar refining industry. The question for consideration is whether the cost of so doing is money wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the trade. LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) said ([1906] A.C. 453) that the words

"‘for the purposes of the trade’ . . . appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade, etc. I think the disbursements permitted are such as are made for that purpose. It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits.”

Speaking of this passage, LORD RADCLIFFE said in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O’Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 542):

“There is much to be said for the criticism that LORD DAVEY’s speech in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) imposes too limiting a criterion as to what is a permissible deduction by way of trade expenditure, but I do not know a wider one that is not vulnerable in other ways, and the fact is that his criterion has stood for so long and been so often applied that it has become, as it were, part of our income tax language.”

Expense incurred in maintaining the properties or assets of the company in a state to earn profits for the business, and expense incurred in protecting the assets against thieves or marauders are properly deductible in arriving at the balance of profits or gains, and so too may be the cost of insurance of the premises owned. A different element creeps in when the expense is incurred for the purpose of opposing nationalisation of an industry or of a particular undertaking. Nothing in the nature of destruction of the assets of the undertaking is involved, nor is there a proposal to render the undertaking, or the industry, less profit bearing, whatever the result might be. It is natural to assume that, if the government took control of an undertaking, it would be their desire to increase rather than to diminish its efficiency and profit-earning capabilities. The proposal was that the ownership of the undertaking, and of the industry, should be taken over by the State, and that thereafter it should be managed by or on behalf of the State. (For the purposes of this appeal I do not draw any distinction between the two forms which nationalisation has taken and which are referred to in the Case.) The directors and the stockholders were anxious to prevent nationalisation of the industry. They wished to retain control of their business, and, no doubt, they thought they would be better placed if they did so.

Counsel for the company placed reliance on the speeches of EARL LOREBURN and LORD SUMNER in Usher’s Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (3). I do not think that much help is to be gained from them in the solution of this question. Nor do I find help in the words of LORD ATKINSON when he was dealing with insurance premiums ([1915] A.C. 452):

Those words were based on a finding of fact in the supplemental Case. It cannot be said that the amount of £15,339 15s. 2d. was expenditure on usual and proper trade outgoings. The nearest approach to that—and it is a long way short of it—is the evidence of Mr. Nicholson, the auditor,

“that in accordance with ordinary commercial accountancy practice the said £29,398 5s. must be charged against the profit to which it related. Any item of expenditure which did not produce a capital asset had to be so charged.”

I take that as meaning that the expenditure was not a capital expense and thus it must be treated as a revenue expense.

The suggested allocation shows that the sum of £15,339 15s. 2d. is attributed by the company to expenditure on "anti-nationalisation (specific)". It seems to me that the money was expended (a) for the purpose of opposing nationalisation of the industry and of the company's undertaking; (b) for the purpose of preventing the company's assets being acquired by the State; (c) for the purpose of securing that the stockholders should be able to retain their interest in the undertaking; (d) for the purpose of maintaining the industry of sugar refining in private control and management as opposed to management by the State. I readily assume that the directors—and the stockholders—believed that it was desirable in the interests of consumers and of workpeople alike that the industry should not be nationalised. I hope I have not formed too wide a view as to the purposes of the expenditure. It is gleaned from the documents forming part of the Case and from the evidence accepted by the commissioners. If all these purposes fall within the words "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade" this appeal must fail, for it matters not that there may be advantage in some other direction if the money was wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the trade. The contention put forward on behalf of the company is that the expenditure was incurred solely for the purposes of the trade of the company, that it was properly debited as an expense, and, in so far as it was made to protect the assets, it was a proper deduction against the profits of the year in that it was expenditure to protect the assets of the profit bearing undertaking. The Solicitor-General, on behalf of the Crown, submitted that the expenditure could not be said to be money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade, but that it was money expended for an extraneous purpose, namely, the purpose of conducting a campaign against nationalisation of the sugar refining industry as a whole and of the company's business and assets in particular, and, further, that it was incurred in a campaign to ensure as far as possible that the earning of profits should remain in the hands of the company, and should not go into the hands of the State. The expenditure, he claimed, was in no sense directed to bringing grist to their mill—to use an expression of ROWLATT, J., in Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. v. Jones (4) (129 L.T. 516). He added that expenditure to keep the ownership of the stock in the hands of the stockholders could not be regarded as a proper deduction under the rules.

The question is not an easy one to answer. If the government of the day proposed an extension of nationalisation which would affect certain industries and an individual or a trading concern engaged in one of those industries incurred expense, by subscription or otherwise, in opposing the proposal, can it be said that the expenditure is wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade? If it is, the government bears almost half the cost at the present rate of tax, whatever the result. And it is not a far cry to the case of a subscription to the funds of the party in opposition. There is no authority on the Income Tax Act, 1918, which provides any real help. There was cited to us the decision of the Privy Council in Ward & Co., Ltd. v. Taxes Comr. (5). That case arose under s. 86 (1) of the Land and Income Tax Act, 1916, under which

" . . . no deduction shall be made in respect of . . . (a) Expenditure or loss of any kind not exclusively incurred in the production of the assessable income derived from that source . . . "

In view of the difference between that section and the rule with which we are concerned, no guidance is given towards the solution of the question with which this court is faced, but it may be worth while repeating some words of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., which were to the same effect as those used in the New Zealand Court of Appeal ([1923] A.C. 149):

"The expenditure in question was not necessary for the production of profit, nor was it in fact incurred for that purpose. It was a voluntary expense incurred with a view to influencing public opinion against taking a step which would have depreciated and partly destroyed the profit-bearing thing. The expense may have been wisely undertaken, and may properly find a place either in the balance sheet or in the profit and loss account of the appellants . . ."

The expenditure in that case was incurred in a campaign in opposition to a measure of prohibition. The fact that it was disallowed has, as I have said, no bearing on the point at issue in this appeal, but the words of the Lord Chancellor are not without interest. Perhaps the passage most helpful to the contention put forward on behalf of the company is in the speech of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (6) ([1926] A.C. 211):

"It was made clear . . . in Usher's case (3) and Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (7) that a sum of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade; and it appears to me that the findings of the commissioners in the present case bring the payment in question within that description."

In each case the important question is to determine the purposes of the expenditure. Whichever way one looks the words "wholly and exclusively" are facing one. They are the governing words of the rule. If there are purposes such as the desire to defeat nationalisation of the industry, or to keep the stockholders in control of the undertaking, can it be said that the money was expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade? Such purposes as I have indicated take the case quite out of the ordinary run and no authority provides much help. It is necessary to go back to the words of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II. If I am right in my conception of the purposes of the expenditure of the sum of £15,339 15s. 2d. I cannot bring myself to think that the expenditure was wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade. Even if it be conceded that one of the reasons for the expenditure was the purposes of the trade, it cannot, I think, be said that this was the only purpose. There were other purposes outside the earning of profits and outside the purposes of the trade. Clearly one of those purposes was to keep the earnings in the hands of the company—or of its stockholders—and to avoid government acquisition of them and of the assets of the company. Under nationalisation the trade and earnings, or profits, of the undertaking might have been the same or more, the same management might have remained and the same workpeople might have been employed, but the profits would not have gone to the same people. The desire to retain those in the hands of the stockholders and to retain control of the undertaking in the hands of individuals rather than to allow the State to take both were, to my mind, among the purposes for which the expenditure was incurred. I am in favour of allowing the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal by one of Her Majesty's inspectors of taxes from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Dec. 18, 1952, dismissing his appeal from a decision of the general commissioners for the city of London to the effect that a sum spent by the respondent company on an advertising campaign designed to influence public opinion against, and thereby if possible avert, the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry in general, and the undertaking of the respondent company in particular, was "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the" respondent company's "trade", within the meaning of para. (a) of r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and as such deductible in computing the profits of the respondent company for the purposes of its assessment to income tax for the year ended Apr. 5, 1951.

The respondent company, which is a company limited by shares incorporated in the year 1903, carries on an extensive sugar refining business, and is said in the Case Stated to refine roughly fifty-three per cent. of all the sugar refined in this country. It also held at all material times a controlling interest in three other British sugar companies, one operating in this country and the others in Jamaica and Trinidad respectively. It is also a member of the British Sugar Refiners' Association, an organisation for protecting the trade interests of the industry. The circumstances in which the respondent company's "anti-nationalisation" campaign was launched are fully described in the Case Stated. It appears from para. 4 that "During the years immediately following the political changes in 1945, the directors of the respondent company were becoming increasingly concerned by reason of statements, written and verbal, made by supporters of the Labour government advocating the nationalisation of the sugar industry"

"Amongst these was a pamphlet by Mr. Ian Mikardo, M.P., which stated (inter alia): 'The products which most obviously suggest themselves for transfer to publicly owned production are margarine, flour, sugar, bricks, shoe-machinery, cement and some specialised chemicals'."

From para. 5 it appears that

"early in 1949 it became evident to the board of directors from reports and articles appearing in the Press that the Labour Party executive was now discussing the question of including in the Labour Party's draft general election programme a project for nationalising the sugar refining industry."

Paragraph 5 goes on to set out as "typical" a number of extracts from the Press, in each of which the sugar refining industry was mentioned as one of the likely subjects for nationalisation. From para. 6 it appears that

"In April, 1949, the Labour Party executive's statement on policy for discussion at the party conference at Blackpool was issued under the title of 'Labour Believes in Britain' " and that: "This confirmed the directors' apprehensions." Paragraph 6 adds an extract from the publication in question, headed: "The Sugar Monopoly", which included the observation:

"One concern dominates the British sugar industry; it also has large interests in some of the colonial territories which the Labour government is pledged to develop", and ended with the words:

"Labour intends to transfer to public ownership all the sugar manufacturing and refining concerns."

Paragraph 6 goes on to say that

"On perusal of this publication, the board of directors entertained no doubt that the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry would become part of the Labour Party's considered official programme and furthermore that the company itself was the 'one concern' therein referred to";

and that the directors "accordingly decided to take every legitimate step to oppose this."

From para. 7 it appears that, in accordance with this decision, Lord Lyle, the president of the respondent company, wrote in his capacity as chairman of the Sugar Refiners' Association a letter to the Rt. Hon. Herbert Morrison, M.P., dated July 14, 1949, requesting that, before any final decision was reached to include in the Labour Party's election policy a proposal to nationalise the sugar industry, Mr. Morrison, as chairman of the Labour Party's committee on election policy, would agree to receive a small deputation from the association; and that this request was refused by a letter in reply from the secretary of the policy committee. From para. 8 it appears that "efforts to obtain consent to the said deputation having failed, the directors were more than ever convinced that nationalisation of the industry was intended and that the company would thereby lose its business and assets"

and that:

"Accordingly at an extraordinary meeting of the stockholders of the company the following resolution was proposed and passed: 'Believing as we do that nothing but harm to workers, consumers and stockholders alike can spring from the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry, the members of this company hereby empower the board of directors to do everything in their power to meet the threats of the nationalists who, learning nothing from the chaos, losses and labour unrest that they have created in other industries, now wish to seize the assets of this company . . .'"

From para. 9 it appears that on Mar. 31, 1949 (before the Labour Party conference referred to in para. 6), the respondent company had entered into an agreement with a company called Aims of Industry, Ltd., whereby, after a recital to the effect that the company was desirous of fostering and promoting the industry of sugar refining with the ultimate view of the preservation and extension of the goodwill of the company's business, Aims of Industry, Ltd., was appointed the company's public relations officer and advertising agent for a period of five years at a fee of £5,000 per annum. Aims of Industry, Ltd., undertook to use its best endeavours to promote the interests of the industry generally, and to that end to seek to extend the knowledge and information of the public generally "in relation to the said industry . . . and its relation to the national economy", with a proviso to the effect that nothing contained in the agreement should be deemed to impose on Aims of Industry, Ltd., any obligation to advertise the company other than as a member of the said industry. And it was also agreed that the company should place to the credit of a joint account at a specified bank a sum of £75,000 for the purpose of meeting all expenditure recommended by Aims of Industry, Ltd., and approved by the company for furthering the aims and objects of the agreement. Paragraph 10 states that "In fulfilment of the obligation imposed upon them by the resolution referred to in para. 8 hereof, the directors decided to intensify their anti-nationalisation propaganda campaign which was of national dimensions and which was in the hands of Aims of Industry, Ltd., in order to try to preserve the business and assets of the company intact."

Paragraph 11 refers to various nationalisations which had taken place before the date on which the respondent company's propaganda campaign had been decided on, and points out that, whereas in the cases of the coal, railway, gas and electricity industries nationalisation broadly took the form of the compulsory acquisition of the respective businesses in return for compensation usually by way of government stock, the method in the cases of the Bank of England and Cable & Wireless, Ltd., had been the compulsory transfer of the shares or stock forming the capital of the companies to nominees of the Treasury or a public body, a method also adopted by the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, as foreshadowed at the material time by the Iron and Steel Bill, which had received its second reading in the House of Commons in November, 1948. The paragraph adds that

"Where the nationalisation of an industry takes the latter form the companies engaged in the industry retain their assets and continue to carry on their businesses.”

As appears from para. 12, Aims of Industry, Ltd., during the respondent company's accounting year to Oct. 1, 1949 (the basis of the assessment under appeal), in fact expended £29,398 5s. out of the £75,000 deposited under the above-mentioned agreement. This sum of £29,398 5s. was entered in the company's profit and loss account for the fifty-two weeks ended Oct. 1, 1949,

- A being included in an item of £42,183 for “Advertising (including anti-nationalisation campaign)”, and was also shown in the company's detailed accounts (“Schedule of expenses”) as submitted to the inspector of taxes under the heading “Central administration. Aims of Industry, London”. The activities of Aims of Industry, Ltd., during the accounting period in question included advertising, film making, film showing, the issue of pamphlets and
- B ration-book holders (suitably inscribed), photography, recordings, etc. A document produced by the respondent company headed: “Aims of Industry, Ltd.—Joint account expenses—Year ended Sept. 29, 1949” contains details of the expenditure of the said sum of £29,398 5s. on these various activities for the year ended September, 1949, and provides a summary of such expenditure with a suggested allocation between “general advertising” “anti-nationalisation (specific)” and “general expenses” as under:—

Suggested Allocation: (1) General advertising £11,508 4s., (2) Anti-nationalisation (specific) £15,339 15s. 2d., (3) General £2,550 5s.

- The respondent company claimed to deduct the whole of the £29,398 5s. as a trading expense and this claim was only disputed as to so much of the total as related specifically to the anti-nationalisation campaign (i.e., item (2) above put by the respondent company at £15,339 15s. 2d.). No issue was raised as to the correctness of the company's apportionment of the total between
- D item (2) “anti-nationalisation (specific)” and the other two items, as it was agreed that the exact amount to be regarded as properly attributable to item (2) could, if necessary, be settled by negotiation once the question of principle had been decided.

- E The annexures to the Case Stated include a number of documents put in to indicate the nature of the publicity employed in the company's anti-nationalisation campaign. It is unnecessary to describe them in detail, for it is not in dispute that they were devised and issued for the specific purpose of influencing public opinion against the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry in general and of the respondent company's undertaking in particular.
- F Three witnesses, whose evidence the commissioners accepted, were called on behalf of the respondent company. The effect of their evidence is thus summarised in para. 15 of the Case:

“Lord Lyle of Westbourne, president of the board of directors of the company gave evidence to the following effect. He had been a director of the company for forty years. He was intimately acquainted with the whole of the sugar refining industry. The directors thought that, if nationalisation occurred, the State would take over the company's assets and its business, and they decided that they would take such legal steps as they could to try to prevent this. The primary object of the propaganda campaign was to prevent the company from losing its business and to preserve its assets intact. He agreed that, if the company lost its business, the stockholders would also suffer and he also agreed that the preservation of the company's business would, incidentally, save the stockholders from injury as well. He had never thought of the alternative method of nationalisation by which the State would have acquired all the capital stock of the company from its members. The directors' intention was to protect the company—in so doing no doubt they protected the stockholders also; it would be their duty to protect them as well. Mr. William Robert Booth, director of the company and secretary since 1945, gave evidence to the following effect. A good deal of the propaganda employed in the campaign was directed towards defending the industry as a whole, although the whole of the expenditure was incurred by the company. It would have been no use having a propaganda campaign to prevent the company alone being nationalised; only by campaigning against the nationalisation of the industry as a whole would the company's own business be saved. Aims of Industry, Ltd., was looking after the company's interests through the industry as a whole. It did occur to him that one way of nationalising the company would be for the State to acquire all the capital stock, but they had no right to assume which form nationalisation would take. There was a danger that it would take various forms, but they could only assume the worst and do their best to protect their own business. They were anxious to prevent nationalisation from taking place in any form. Mr. John Arthur Nicholson, a chartered accountant and member of the firm of Edmund D. White & Sons, auditors to the company, . . . formally produced the auditor's report and accounts. He stated that, in accordance with ordinary commercial accountancy practice, the said £29,398 5s. must be charged against the profit to which it related. Any item of expenditure which did not produce a capital asset had to be so charged."

H

Such being the facts, the question in the appeal is whether on these facts the commissioners and the learned judge were right in law in holding, as they did, that the respondent company's expenditure on its anti-nationalisation campaign was "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the" respondent company's "trade" within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. In answering this question it must be borne in mind that the commissioners are the judges of fact, and, accordingly, that their decision should not be disturbed if on the facts as found by them the disputed expenditure is capable in law of being held to satisfy the above-stated requirement of r. 3 (a). The relevant statutory provisions are these. The Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 209 (1), provides:

"In arriving at the amount of profits or gains for the purpose of income tax—(a) no other deductions shall be made than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act."

By sched. D, para. 1:

"Tax under this schedule shall be charged in respect of—(a) The annual profits or gains arising or accruing . . . (ii) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation, whether the same be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere."

By para. 2:

"Tax under this schedule shall be charged under the following Cases respectively; that is to say,—Case I.—Tax in respect of any trade not contained in any other schedule."

Then the Rule Applicable to Case I of sched. D is:

"The tax shall extend to every trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere . . . and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains . . ."

The Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, so far as relevant, are as follows. Rule 1 (1):

"The tax shall be charged without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed."

Rule 3:

"In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade . . .";

to which one might add para. (f) of the same rule:

A "In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(f) any capital withdrawn from, or any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, profession, employment or vocation."

B The curiously negative structure of these provisions, or their predecessors, has been the subject of much comment. Section 209 (1) (a) enjoins that, in arriving at the amounts of profits or gains for the purpose of income tax, no other deductions shall be made than such as are expressly enumerated in the Act. But, turning to the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, one finds in r. 3, instead of an enumeration of permitted deductions, an enumeration of items the deduction of which is prohibited, with certain exceptions from or qualifications of those prohibitions. Thus, r. 3 (a) does not provide that money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade may be deducted, but that no sum shall be deducted in respect of any disbursements or expenses not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. It is, however, obvious that, if no deduction at all of expenses from gross receipts was allowed, it would be impossible to arrive at the balance of the profits and gains of a trade on which tax under Case I of sched. D is to be assessed. Accordingly, it has long been well settled that the effect of these provisions as to deductions is that the balance of the profits and gains of a trade must be ascertained in accordance with the ordinary principles of commercial trading, by deducting from the gross receipts all expenditure properly deductible from them on those principles, save in so far as any amount so deducted falls within any of the statutory prohibitions contained in the relevant rules, in which case it must be added back for the purpose of arriving at the balance of profits and gains assessable to tax: see Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (3), per EARL LOREBURN ([1915] A.C. 444), LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON (ibid., 458), LORD SUMNER (ibid., 467, 468), and LORD PARMOOR (ibid., 473, 474).

F It appears to have been argued for the Crown before the learned judge (though it had not been so contended before the commissioners) that, even if the expenditure on the respondent company's anti-nationalisation campaign was laid out wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the respondent company's trade, it was not proper to be deducted in ascertaining the respondent company's profits according to the ordinary principles of commercial trading, because it was of a capital nature, and, accordingly, that, irrespective of any statutory prohibition, it was not a permissible deduction for income tax purposes. G This submission was (as I think, rightly) rejected by the learned judge, and direct reliance on it as a substantive ground of appeal was (if I understood him correctly) disclaimed by the Solicitor-General in the course of the argument before us. It was, however, suggested in this court, though, perhaps, somewhat faintly, that, on grounds which I confess I had difficulty in following, the expenditure in question, though not strictly speaking of a capital nature, was nevertheless not properly deductible in ascertaining the company's profits on the ordinary principles of commercial trading. This argument was never fully or clearly developed, and was, I think, in the end virtually abandoned, but if and so far as it should be considered as remaining on foot, I reject it. There is no trace of it in the Crown's contentions as set out in the Case Stated, and I think it is really concluded against him by the evidence of Mr. Nicholson as summarised and accepted by the commissioners. H

One other point can be shortly disposed of. It was contended on behalf of the Crown before the commissioners and before the learned judge that the expenditure on the anti-nationalisation campaign, even if laid out for the purposes of the respondent company's trade, was not wholly and exclusively so laid out, inasmuch as it was concerned with the sugar refining industry as a whole and not confined to the respondent company's undertaking. With regard to this submission the learned judge said:

"There is, in my judgment, nothing in this point. It was clear that a campaign of this sort could not be conducted in favour of one concern in the industry and that the only way to protect the respondents was to protect their competitors along with them. Therefore, the fact that the whole industry was included did not make the money the less laid out exclusively for the purposes of the respondents' trade."

I need do no more than say that I entirely agree with the learned judge on this point, for it was abandoned by the Solicitor-General in the course of the argument before us.

There remains as the one live issue in the case the question I have already posed, namely, whether, on the facts as found by the commissioners, the disputed expenditure was in law rightly held by them and by the learned judge to have been wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the respondent company's trade within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D; or, perhaps, I should rather say whether on the facts as found it was capable in law of being held to have been so laid out or expended. The deceptively simple words "wholly and exclusively . . . for the purposes of the trade", which at first sight suggest a plain question of fact well within the competence of experienced commissioners, have been the subject of much judicial discussion, and at this time of day it is out of the question for anyone to maintain that they do not involve a question of law.

In Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) LORD DAVEY placed on the corresponding provision of the Income Tax Act, 1842, the following construction, which has held the field ever since ([1906] A.C. 453):

"These words are used in other rules, and appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade, etc. I think the disbursements permitted are such as are made for that purpose. It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits."

The actual sum there held not to have been laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade was a sum of damages payable by the taxpayers (the appellants) to a customer sleeping at one of their inns who was injured by the fall of a chimney.

In Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (3) the disputed deductions were in respect of the following expenses in connection with the tied houses of a brewery company: (a) repairs to tied houses; (b) differences between rents of leasehold houses or sched. A assessments of freehold houses and the rents received from tied tenants; (c) fire and licence insurance premiums; (d) rates and taxes, and (f) legal and other costs. All these expenses were held in the House of Lords to be admissible deductions as being money wholly laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of the brewery company. The following passages from the speeches in the House of Lords with respect to two of these items may usefully be quoted. With respect to item (a) (the repairs) LORD ATKINSON said ([1915] A.C. 450):

"Now the supplemental statement of the facts in para. A sets forth that though the tenants are under their agreements bound to make the necessary repairs, the appellants, in fact, execute them at their own expense, because it is found to be to their interest commercially so to do rather than to enforce the obligations of their tenants; that the cost of the repairs is incurred not as a matter of charity, but of commercial expediency in order to avoid the loss of tenants, and the consequent transfers, to which the licensing justices object. The meaning of para. 8 taken together with this para. A is, I think, simply this, that in the proper and reasonable conduct by the appellants of their trade they are obliged to defray the cost of these repairs, inasmuch as the same are necessary to enable the houses to serve the very purpose for which the appellants have solely and exclusively acquired and used them. I may say for myself that I am wholly unable to follow the line of reasoning which would lead one to the conclusion that where premises have been acquired and used wholly and exclusively for a particular purpose, the expenditure upon them necessary to enable them to fulfil that purpose is not expenditure incurred solely and exclusively for the very purpose for which they have been acquired and used. I think therefore that the condensed meaning of these paragraphs when properly construed is simply this, that the expenditure for repairs is incurred solely and exclusively for the purposes of the appellants' trade."

C With respect to the same item LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said (ibid., 461):

"Though each tenancy agreement contains a repairing covenant on the part of the tenant, the tenant in fact does no repairs. The brewery company have found by experience that as a matter of commercial expediency it is better to do the repairs themselves rather than, by insisting on performance of the covenants, to run the risk of loss of tenants and consequent transfers to which the licensing justices object. The appellants claim that the amount so spent in repairs ought to be deducted in ascertaining the balance of profits and gains of their trade, such repairs having, as found in the Case, been solely repairs which the appellants were bound to do in order to maintain the licensed houses in a condition fit to use as licensed houses, and the sum expended not being an excessive sum to be expended in such repairs. I am of opinion that the appellants are right in this contention."

With respect to item (c) (the insurance premiums) LORD ATKINSON said this (ibid., 452):

"As to item C, the purposes for which the insurances upon the premises are effected are set out. They are found to be usual and proper trade outgoings, and are made as such by the appellants. They are designed to cover the loss of the fabric by fire and the loss sustained if the licences were not renewed. Smith v. Lion Brewery Co., Ltd. (8) applies, I think, to the latter disbursement, and the remarks I have already made apply to the former as well as to the remaining items D and F."

G In Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (7) where a gratuity paid to a retiring law reporter was claimed as a deductible expense of the council's trade, SCRUTTON, J., in holding the deduction of the sum in question admissible, expressed what, I think, must now be regarded as the untenable view that the question whether a sum was wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade was a question of fact, but in the course of his judgment he gave some useful illustrations of sums which might be held to answer that description ([1914] 3 K.B. 684):

"There may be cases where it is clear even to a judge who knows nothing about the trade, that a particular payment could not be wholly or exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade. I do not desire to discuss politics, but I take examples which seem to me fairly clear. Payments for political purposes might conceivably be for the purposes of trade. It might be that a payment by a company to the Tariff Reform League might be of great advantage to its trade. It might be that a payment by a company to a political party which was supposed to be identified with the interests of a particular trade might be to the advantage of the trade; but one can easily imagine cases, such as a payment by a company to the National Service League, where it would be impossible to conceive that anybody could find that such money was wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade."

In Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. v. Jones (4), a company which had made over premises situated abroad to an American company for a term of years continued after the transfer to pay fire insurance premiums in respect of the premises. ROWLATT, J., and the Court of Appeal held that the premiums so paid were not deductible, ROWLATT, J., observing (129 L.T. 516):

"The appellant company have parted with this business . . . and they have got the ownership left in them of some premises abroad and they think fit or may be compelled, it does not matter which, to insure them against fire. That is not bringing grist to their mill or bringing customers to their door . . ."

In British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (6) (where the actual decision was to the effect that a lump sum paid by a company to form the nucleus of a pension fund for its employees was in the nature of capital expenditure and, therefore, not deductible in arriving at the company's profits) VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., said ([1926] A.C. 211):

"My Lords, I think it clear that the deduction from the profits of the above-mentioned sum of £31,784 is not prohibited by the first (sic.) Rule Applicable to Cases I and II, which prohibits the deduction of a disbursement not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. It was made clear in the above cited cases of Usher's Wiltshire Brewery v. Bruce (3) and Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (7) that a sum of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade; and it appears to me that the findings of the commissioners in the present case bring the payment in question within that description. They found (in words which I have already quoted) that the payment was made for the sound commercial purpose of enabling the company to retain the services of existing and future members of their staff and of increasing the efficiency of the staff; and after referring to the contention of the Crown that the sum of £31,784 was not money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade under the rule above referred to, they found that the deduction was admissible—thus in effect, although not in terms, negating the Crown's contention. I think that there was ample material to support the findings of the commissioners, and accordingly that this prohibition does not apply."

In Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. (9) a large payment made by a company to a retiring director in settlement of a dispute with him was held by ROWLATT, J., and the Court of Appeal to be deductible. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1927] 1 K.B. 737):

"It was a payment made in the course of business, with reference to a particular difficulty which arose in the course of the year, and was made not in order to secure an actual asset to the company but to enable the company to continue to carry on, as it had done in the past, the same type and high quality of business, unfettered and unimpered by the presence of one who, if the public had known about his position, might have caused difficulty in its business and whom it was necessary to deal and settle with at once."

SARGANT, L.J., said (ibid., 738):

A "Now, first, as to the question whether this was a disbursement wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, it seems to me that there is nothing at all to show that it was not so exclusively laid out. The object, as disclosed by para. 9 of the Case, was that of preserving the status and reputation of the company, which the directors felt would be somewhat imperilled by the other director remaining in the business or by a dismissal of him against his will, involving proceedings by way of action in which the good name of the company might suffer. To avoid B that and to preserve the status and dividend-earning power of the company seems to me a purpose which is well within the ordinary purposes of the trade, profession or vocation of the company."

C In Southern v. Borax Consolidated, Ltd. (10) a company incurred legal expenses in defending proceedings in America in which its title to certain premises there was attacked, and LAWRENCE, J., in holding these expenses deductible said ([1940] 4 All E.R. 419):

"It appears to me that the legal expenses which were incurred by the respondent company did not create any new asset at all, but were expenses which were incurred in the ordinary course of maintaining the assets of the company, and the fact that it was maintaining the title, and not the value, of the company's business does not make it any different."

D That case was approved in Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (11), per LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1946] 1 All E.R. 72).

E In Cooke v. Quick Shoe Repair Service (12) a firm purchased a business on terms that the vendor should discharge all liabilities of the business outstanding at the date of sale. The vendor failed to do so and the firm accordingly discharged the liabilities itself in order to preserve the goodwill and to ensure continuity of supplies, and the sums so expended were held by CROOM-JOHNSON, J., to be deductible on the principles stated in Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (7), Atherton v. British Insulated & Helsby Cables, Ltd. (6), Southern v. Borax Consolidated, Ltd. (10), and Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. (9).

F Lastly, so far as English authorities are concerned, I should refer to the two recent cases in the House of Lords of Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland (13) and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1). In Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland (13) the House held by a majority that the costs of contesting an excess profits tax assessment were not deductible. LORD PORTER says of the phrase "purposes of the trade" ([1948] 2 All E.R. 370):

G "The phraseology and its meaning have been dealt with in a considerable number of cases, but before considering their effect I think it desirable to state the conclusion at which I should have arrived from a study of the wording of the section itself. The widest meaning attributed to it, and that for which the appellants contend, is, perhaps, best expressed by saying that it includes every expense to which the trader is put because he carries H on the trade."

And (ibid., 371):

"The opposite view maintained by the Crown is, perhaps, best expressed in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) ([1906] A.C. 448, 453) where LORD DAVEY says: 'These words . . . appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade . . .' My Lords, that expression has often been referred to and approved, but it was used in reference to the circumstances of the case then under consideration, and I doubt if it carries the matter to a final conclusion. It still leaves open the question what expense is incurred for the purpose of enabling a trader to earn profits, and the adoption of a phrase helpful in analysing the meaning of words in an Act of Parliament with reference to a particular set of circumstances is not necessarily either useful or conclusive in all cases. It is probably safer to retain the wording of the Act itself, and, by applying it to the facts established, to discover whether the deduction falls within its terms or not."

"My Lords, Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodifield (2) may be said to form the starting point for deducing the principles at stake in the present appeal, and, though the words of LORD DAVEY quoted above are the expression most frequently referred to, I think that those of LORD LOREBURN, L.C., have equal, if not greater, importance. He says ([1906] A.C. 448, 452): 'It does not follow that if a loss is in any sense connected with the trade, it must always be allowed as a deduction; for it may be only remotely connected with the trade or it may be connected with something else quite as much as or even more than with the trade. I think only such losses can be deducted as are connected with in the sense that they are really incidental to the trade itself. They cannot be deducted if they are mainly incidental to some other vocation or fall on the trader in some character other than that of trader'. Further, LORD DAVEY, after pointing out that Case I related to trades, manufactures, adventures or concerns in the nature of trade, goes on to say (ibid., 453): 'It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits'. These expressions of opinion, given some forty years ago, and accepted ever since are, in my view, inconsistent with the appellants' contention, but it is said they are at best dicta and are inconsistent with the principles on which such authorities as Smith v. Lion Brewery Co., Ltd. (8), and Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (3) are based, and in particular with the observations of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (6) ([1926] A.C. 205, 211, 212) . . ."

Of the passage in the last-mentioned case to which I have already referred, LORD PORTER says this ([1948] 2 All E.R. 372):

"My Lords, this statement was obiter only as the actual decision was merely that the expenditure was capital expenditure, and, therefore, not deductible, but the language does require careful consideration. In that case the question actually in issue was whether subscriptions by a company towards a pension fund were to be deducted in ascertaining the balance of profits and gains of its trade. It was true that the expenditure did not at once affect its revenue, but it was a method of ensuring the better and more contented service of its employees and in that sense it did directly affect the success of its enterprise. It was exclusively laid out to enable the company to be more successful: no part of it was incurred in order to ascertain the Revenue's proportion of the profits when made."

LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 374):

"My Lords, I suppose that few expressions have been discussed more often in the courts than that which you have once again to consider, 'money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade,' but it is their application rather than their meaning that is in doubt. I agree with the submission of learned counsel that it does not help to substitute other words for those which are found in the statute and then to put a gloss on those other words, but it is, I think, important to emphasise that the words 'for the purposes of the trade' in their context, i.e., where a computation of 'profits' for the ascertainment of taxable income is being made, must mean 'for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade.' These familiar words I cite from LORD DAVEY's speech in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) ([1906] A.C. 448, 453). They have been cited and applied over and over again, and, if they are kept firmly in mind, they dispose in limine of the argument which prevailed with ATKINSON, J., and has been urged before your Lordships."

In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1) the House held that Irish taxes were not deductible. LORD REID referred to LORD DAVEY's speech in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) and said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 539):

"This explanation has always been regarded as authoritative and is difficult to reconcile with the respondents' contention."

LORD RADCLIFFE, after quoting again LORD DAVEY's speech in the last mentioned case, said (ibid., 542):

"In this case, there is no material that makes it possible to say that these taxes (let alone any particular proportion of them) were paid for the purpose of earning such profits as were earned in the United Kingdom. There is much to be said for the criticism that LORD DAVEY's speech in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) imposes too limiting a criterion as to what is a permissible deduction by way of trade expenditure, but I do not know a wider one that is not vulnerable in other ways, and the fact is that his criterion has stood for so long and been so often applied that it has become, as it were, part of our income tax language."

The foregoing review of authorities, though, I fear, unduly long, is by no means exhaustive. Many other cases might be referred to, but no useful purpose would be served by further multiplying citations. Each case depends to a great extent on its particular facts and is of assistance only in so far as some general principle emerges from it, and I think the cases which I have selected for reference can be regarded as sufficiently expounding and illustrating the law to be applied to the particular facts of the case now before the court. The principles which emerge seem to be these: (i) the prohibition against the deduction of disbursements or expenses not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade means that, in order to be deductible, a disbursement or expense must be laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of enabling the trader concerned to carry on and earn profits in the trade: LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) ([1906] A.C. 453); but (ii) notwithstanding LORD DAVEY's additional observation to the effect that the disbursement must be made "for the purpose of earning the profits," LORD LOREBURN's observation in the same case (ibid., 452) to the effect that disbursements to be deductible must be "really incidental to the trade itself", and ROWLATT, J.'s reference in the Union Cold Storage case (4) (129 L.T. 516) to "bringing grist to the mill," it is clear that disbursements to be deductible need not be directly or immediately productive of profit.

per VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in Atherton's case (6) ([1926] A.C. 212); and (iii) payments made for the purpose of preserving the assets or goodwill of a business, and thereby safeguarding its earning capacity, and payments for protecting the trader from losses in his trade or from being deprived of the means of carrying it on, may be wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade, just as much as payments made for the immediate purpose of producing or increasing profits; compare the fire insurance premiums in the Usher's Wiltshire Brewery case (3), the payment to the retiring director in Mitchell v. B. W. Noble, Ltd. (9), the legal expenses in the Borax case (10), and the discharge of the liabilities of the predecessor in business in the Quick Shoe Repair case (12); but (iv) payments made out of profits when earned (such as the Irish tax in Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1)) or in relation to the determination of a liability to tax on those profits (as in Smith's Potato Estates (13)) or (by parity of reasoning) payments made with a view to preventing the transfer from one person or class of persons to another of the right to receive, through the trader, the profits when earned, are not made for the purposes of the trade within the meaning of the statutory prohibition. A

The effect of the facts found by the commissioners in the present case, and, in particular, of the evidence of Lord Lyle and Mr. Booth which they accepted, was that the directors believed that there was a real risk of the "nationalisation" of the sugar refining industry in general and of the company's undertaking in particular, and (with the qualification mentioned below) further believed that, if this occurred, the State would take over the company's assets and business, thus bringing completely to an end the whole of the trading activities of the company in its business of sugar refining. The qualification to which I have just referred is that, whereas, according to the evidence as summarised in the Case, Lord Lyle had B

"never thought of the alternative method of nationalisation by which the State would have acquired all the capital stock of the company from its members," D

Mr. Booth said:

"It did occur to him that one way of nationalising the company would be for the State to acquire all the capital stock, but they had no right to assume which form nationalisation would take. There was a danger that it would take various forms, but they could only assume the worst and do their best to protect their own business. They were anxious to prevent nationalisation from taking place in any form." E

It should, therefore, be taken that the directors' belief that in the event of nationalisation the State would take over the company's assets and business was tempered by recognition on the part of at least one of them of the possibility that nationalisation might take the less direct form of a compulsory acquisition by or on behalf of the State of all the issued capital stock of the company. F

The evidence of these two directors having been accepted by the commissioners, it must be taken for the purposes of this appeal that the board of the company genuinely believed that there was a serious risk of the introduction and passing of legislation for the nationalisation of the sugar refining industry in general and the company's undertaking in particular, and further genuinely believed that there was a serious risk that any such legislation would involve the taking over by or on behalf of the State of the company's assets and business; and it must also be taken that the real and genuine object of the anti-nationalisation campaign was (as Lord Lyle in effect put it) primarily to prevent the company from losing its business and to preserve its assets intact, though incidentally the preservation of the company's business would save the stockholders from injury as well, or (in other words) to preserve the assets and business of the company, and by so doing protect the interests of the company's stockholders. G H

The suggestion that the expenditure on the anti-nationalisation campaign was not properly deductible from profits according to the ordinary principles of commercial trading being out of the way, I cannot, for my part, find any sufficient ground for the view that, on the facts found and evidence accepted by the commissioners, this expenditure was incapable in law of being held to have been wholly and exclusively laid out or expended "for the purposes of" the company's "trade" within the meaning of that expression as construed and explained by the authorities.

- Two grounds for that view were advanced on behalf of the Crown. First, it was said that nationalisation, even in the full and direct form of a compulsory acquisition of the whole of the assets and undertaking of the company, would not destroy the company's business, but merely transfer it from the ownership of the company into the ownership of whatever body or authority the nationalising legislation might constitute for the purpose of carrying it on. Thus, it was argued that the expenditure in question was laid out, not for the purpose of preserving the company's business, but for the purpose of preventing the company's business from being taken away from the company and transferred to, and thenceforth carried on by, the new body or authority. I confess myself unable to follow this argument. The trade with which we are here concerned is surely the trade carried on by the company; the purposes for which the disputed expenditure, in order to be allowable as a deduction, must be shown to have been laid out are surely the purposes of the trade so carried on; and, when LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodifield (2) explained expenditure for the purposes of the trade as expenditure for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade, surely he meant for the purpose of enabling the trader claiming to deduct that expenditure to carry on and earn profits in his trade. It is clear on the authorities that LORD DAVEY's formula includes expenditure for the purpose of preventing a person from being disabled from carrying on and earning profits in the trade. Here, too, it seems to me reasonably plain that the relevant trade is that of the trader claiming to make the deduction. There is no doubt that legislation compulsorily divesting a trader of the whole of the assets and goodwill of his business, and (one may suppose) precluding him from establishing any similar business in the future, would utterly disable him from carrying on and earning profits in his trade. In such a case the destination provided by the legislation for the goodwill and assets so divested would, as it seems to me, be wholly immaterial for the purposes of the present question. Such assets and goodwill might be merged with those of other businesses similarly taken over in the hands of some statutory body or authority. Alternatively, a separate business might be carried on by the acquiring body or authority in succession to the hypothetical trader I have mentioned, with and by means of the assets and goodwill compulsorily acquired from him. But whichever course was taken his trade and his ability to earn profits in that trade would be clean gone. One may add, so far as the present case is concerned, that there is no reason for supposing that, if nationalisation had supervened, the second of the above-mentioned courses would have been taken rather than the first.
- The second argument presented for the Crown was to the effect that nationalisation, if it had taken place at all, might have been carried out by means of a compulsory acquisition by or on behalf of the State of the whole of the capital stock of the company, in which case the assets and business of the company would have been preserved intact in the hands of the company; that, as nationalisation might possibly have taken this form, the company's anti-nationalisation campaign must be taken to have been partly directed against this possible form of nationalisation; and that, so far as the campaign was so directed, it was concerned, not with enabling the company to continue to carry on and earn profits in its trade, but with the destination of its profits when earned; and, accordingly, that, on the principle of Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (1) and Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. (13), the expenditure incurred in the campaign was to this extent not laid out for the purposes of the company's trade, and, therefore, not wholly and exclusively so laid out. I cannot accept this argument. At the time of the anti-nationalisation campaign all that could be said with certainty was that there was a risk of nationalisation. What form nationalisation might take if it took place at all no one could say. The directors of the company believed that, if it did take place, there was a serious risk (to put it no higher) that the company's assets and business would be taken over by the State. They, accordingly, launched their anti-nationalisation campaign for the purpose of protecting the company's assets and business against that risk. It might, of course, be that in the actual event nationalisation would not take place at all, for reasons wholly unconnected with the campaign. But that would not have affected the quality of the expenditure on the campaign, though in the result it might be said to have served no useful purpose. Again, nationalisation might take place in the form of a compulsory acquisition of the business and assets of the company. In that case the campaign would have failed, and in the result the money spent on the campaign would have been thrown away. But that would not have affected the quality of the expenditure, any more than the quality of a trader's expenditure on fire insurance is affected by the circumstance that his buildings never in fact catch fire. Finally, nationalisation might take place in some less direct form such as the compulsory acquisition by or on behalf of the State of the whole of the capital stock of the company. In that case the risk against which the campaign was designed to protect the company (i.e., the loss of its assets and business) would not have materialised, though for practical purposes a substantially similar result would indirectly have been achieved. But, again, I fail to see how that could affect the quality of the expenditure. Given a decision by the directors that they ought as a matter of commercial expediency to do what they could by means of publicity and propaganda to save the company from being deprived of its assets and business through nationalisation (and I think it is clear that this on the facts found must be imputed to them) I fail to see how they could implement that decision otherwise than by campaigning against nationalisation, or how it can be said that their purpose was not to protect the business and assets of the company because nationalisation might possibly take the indirect form of a compulsory acquisition of capital stock, as distinct from the indirect form of a compulsory acquisition of the assets and undertaking of the company.

I have only to add, with respect to the Privy Council case of Ward & Co., Ltd. v. Taxes Comr. (5), that, while the expenditure in question affords a closer parallel to the disputed expenditure in the present case than is to be found in any of the other cases of which I am aware, the language of the material New Zealand enactment which prohibited the deduction of expenditure "not exclusively incurred in the production of the assessable income" was so markedly different from, and so much narrower than, the language of the enactment governing the present case that I cannot regard it as providing any authority against the conclusion to which I have come. As LORD CAVE said at the end of his judgment ([1923] A.C. 150):

"It is only necessary to add that the decisions on the English Income Tax Acts, the language of which is different from that of the New Zealand Act, have no real bearing upon the question now under decision."

For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I would dismiss this appeal.

HODSON, L.J. (read by JENKINS, L.J.): The question in this appeal is whether expense incurred in a propaganda campaign against nationalisation of the sugar refining industry organised by the respondent company is deductible for income tax purposes in computing the balance of profits and gains of the company. If this expense is deductible it must be because it was wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of the respondent company. The Crown contends that none of this expenditure can be regarded as expenditure in carrying on the trade or as expenditure incurred for earning profits in the trade, but that on the contrary it was incurred in order to secure that the ownership of the assets of the company should remain in the same hands. It is said that, the object being to secure that the present owners remain the owners, the object is not to secure profits, and just as expenditure incurred in acquiring a capital asset is not deductible, so expenditure incurred in the prevention of acquisition is equally not deductible.

- A The question has not arisen before in the courts of this country, but a similar case has arisen in the Privy Council on appeal from the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, namely, Ward & Co., Ltd. v. Taxes Comr. (5). A poll of voters being about to be held under statutory authority on the question whether or not prohibition of intoxicants should be introduced, a brewery company carrying on business in New Zealand expended money in printing and distributing anti-prohibition literature. The company sought to deduct the expenditure in the assessment of the income derived from their business for the purposes of the Land and Income Tax Act, 1916, of New Zealand. By s. 86 (1) (a) of that Act no deduction was to be made in respect of expenditure "not exclusively incurred in the production of the assessable income". It was held that the company was not entitled to make the deduction having regard to the language of the sub-section. It is to be observed that the words "exclusively incurred in the production of the assessable income" are different from and narrower than the words "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade" and that the Board of the Privy Council concluded their judgment by stating that the decisions on the English Income Tax Acts, the language of which is different from that of the New Zealand Act, have no real bearing on the question then for decision. I do not think that the decision on the narrower words of the New Zealand Act is of great assistance here. It is interesting to note that the argument addressed to the board by the taxpayer and rejected, having regard to the language of the New Zealand Act, was in the main that addressed to the court in this case. This argument found its support in the speeches delivered in the House of Lords in Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (3), interpreting the words of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which correspond with the rules now in force in this country. The argument was in substance that the expenditure in question did not differ in kind from that laid out on insurance.

- I, therefore, turn to Usher's case (3) in which one of the disputed items related to fire and licence insurance premiums. The Court of Appeal had said that the fire insurance premiums were not wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the company's trade or business and were not legitimate deductions under sched. D, being paid to insure the "fabric" to protect the landlords from loss by destruction of their property. It was pointed out that what was insured against was the destruction by fire of the houses. As to the licence insurance premiums, these, it was said, were paid to insure against loss of the licences in cases where no compensation was payable out of the compensation fund. It was held by the Court of Appeal that they were payable, in the main if not wholly, to protect the company as owners of the property from any diminution of the value of the houses as the result of the licences being taken away without any right to compensation. Later the judgment continues by pointing out that the sums received under such a policy by the brewery company recompense them for the diminution of the value of the property. Accordingly, both fire and licence insurance premiums were disallowed. The judgment of the Court of Appeal appears to me to proceed on the same lines as the argument addressed to us by the Crown in this case. This judgment was, however, reversed by the House of Lords. Their Lordships were unanimous in holding that these items were not within the prohibition, but as a matter of law could be held properly to be "wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of the trade". LORD ATKINSON says in Usher's case (3) ([1915] A.C. 452):

" . . . the purposes for which the insurances upon the premises are effected are set out. They are found to be usual and proper trade outgoings, and are made as such by the appellants. They are designed to cover the loss of the fabric by fire and the loss sustained if the licences were not renewed. Smith v. Lion Brewery Co., Ltd. (8) applies, I think, to the latter disbursement, and the remarks I have already made apply to the former as well as to the remaining items D and F."

In my opinion, the decision in Usher's case (3) supports the view contended for by the respondent company in this case. It was, however, contended by the Crown that if the test laid down by the well-known dictum of LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (2) ([1906] A.C. 453), is applied, the deduction ought not to be allowed. He said of the words "for the purpose of the trade" in the Act of 1842:

"These words . . . appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade, etc. . . . It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits."

The question, as LORD PORTER pointed out in Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland (13) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 371), is still left open as to what expense is incurred for the purpose of enabling a trader to earn profits. These words cannot be read literally. Fire insurance premiums on the premises in which the trade is carried on do not increase the profits, but they are necessary to maintain the assets of the trade in a condition to earn profits. A fire may never happen, nationalisation may never happen. But it is open as a matter of law, in my judgment, to find, as the commissioners have found in the present case, that the expenditure incurred in carrying out the propaganda campaign against nationalising the sugar refining industry was wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade and was accordingly an admissible deduction for income tax purposes. It was laid out to prevent the seizure of the company's business assets so as to enable the company to continue as in the past to earn profits in the trade carried on by the company.

I reject, therefore, the contention that the expenditure was laid out for purposes so indirect and remote from the trade carried on by the company that it was not in law open to the commissioners to find as they did. To use the language of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in British Insulated & Helsby Cables v. Atherton (6), in which it was held that a lump sum paid by a company to form the nucleus of a pension fund for its employees was capital expenditure and accordingly not deductible ([1926] A.C. 212):

" . . . a sum of money expended . . . voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade."

The point which prevailed in Atherton's case (6), namely, that the payment in question was a capital payment, was not taken before the Special Commissioners in this case and was not argued in this court as a separate point. The passage which I have read from LORD CAVE's speech appears to me to bear on the question to be decided in this case and to support the contention of the company. In my opinion, the expenditure is a proper debit item to be charged against the incomings of the trade when computing the balance of the profits of it, and is none the less a proper revenue charge because it is laid out for the purpose of preserving the assets of the company. It is not, I think, a good answer to say that the asset is not in danger and the only question is a change of ownership. If the trader has his business taken from him by the State, whatever form nationalisation may take, he cannot continue to carry on his trade. Accordingly, expenditure laid out in protecting himself against nationalisation is directed towards enabling him to retain the trade which he is carrying on. I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

TIMMINS v. TIMMINS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Hodson, L.JJ., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), April 15, 16, 17, May 18, 1953.]

Divorce—Restitution of conjugal rights—Answer to petition—"Grave and weighty" conduct falling short of cruelty.

A husband was inclined to be overbearing, domineering, dictatorial, and insistent on maintaining his rights as a husband and on having the household conducted in accordance with his ideas. He was of hasty temper and habitually expressed himself in rapid unmeasured terms. On one occasion (more than two years before they finally parted) he struck his wife on the shoulders and the mouth. The court found that his conduct might have had an ill effect on the wife's health, but that it had been condoned. A month before the separation the wife suffered a mental breakdown and spent a fortnight in the mental ward of a hospital, suffering from delusions, and, in particular, from a persecution mania. A fortnight after her return from hospital she left her husband, taking one of their three children with her. On finding her, the husband took the child away, although it was in tears. When, after proceedings had started, she returned to him, saying she had come back for three days, he told her: "You will come back for good or not at all".

HELD: in the absence of proof of an intention by the husband to injure the wife there was no ground for reversing the decision of the trial judge that the husband was not guilty of cruelty, but (HODSON, L.J., dissentiente) the husband's conduct was a grave and weighty matter which gave the wife good cause for leaving him and prevented him from obtaining a decree of restitution of conjugal rights unless and until he satisfied the court that, if she returned to him, he would behave with conjugal kindness, and, therefore, was a defence to the husband's suit for restitution.

APPEAL from an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated Oct. 17, 1952, granting the husband a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, and dismissing the wife's answer to the husband's petition, in which she claimed a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty.

The wife contended that the husband's conduct constituted cruelty entitling her to a decree of divorce, and that, even if it did not amount to cruelty, it was of so grave and weighty a nature as to entitle her to leave her husband and, therefore, to be a defence to his petition for the restitution of conjugal rights. WALLINGTON, J., gave judgment for the husband on both points. The wife appealed.

Simon, Q.C., and Shenfield for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 18. The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: The parties married on Feb. 2, 1938, when the husband was twenty-seven and the wife twenty-three. They separated on Apr. 13, 1951, when the wife left the home. They have three children who at the date of the separation were aged seven, five and three. On May 10, 1951, the husband filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights. The wife put in an answer in which she said she had just cause for leaving him and claimed a divorce for cruelty. The judge has rejected the wife's charges of cruelty and granted the husband a decree for restitution. The wife appeals to this court.

There is one salient fact in the case. On Mar. 13, 1951, just a month before the separation, the wife had a mental break-down and spent a fortnight in the mental ward of a hospital. The nature of the break-down was described by the medical officer of the hospital in this way:

"She was agitated and suffering from delusions. She said she was having messages from God and that God was speaking to her. She said that her husband had tried to kill her with a knife and poison her with some fluid 'which was not brandy as he said it was.'"

By Mar. 26, 1951, she had greatly improved and on Mar. 30, 1951, she was allowed to go home.

She had only been home two weeks, however, when on Apr. 13, 1951, she left, taking the middle child, a girl aged five, with her. She said in evidence that the reason she left was because at night in bed her husband put his hands round her throat to strangle her. But there was nothing to corroborate her on this point and the judge did not accept her evidence. After she left, the husband had great difficulty in finding where she had gone. He eventually found her and the child three weeks later at a village eight miles away. He took the child away from her—the child was in tears about it—and took her back to the others. Two weeks later, he fetched the wife home also, but she only stayed till five o'clock the next morning and then left finally. Several months later, long after proceedings had started, she came back and said she had come for three days. The husband said: "You will come back for good or not at all." She went away again, and has never returned.

In the course of the case the wife made many charges of violence against the husband. When you remember that this wife has suffered from a persecution mania, the judge was fully justified in holding that he could not accept her evidence unless it was corroborated. The judge has found no specific incident proved except one which the husband admits, viz., that in December, 1948, he hit his wife on the shoulders and in the mouth. This was, as the judge found, "wholly without excuse", but it was over two years before the final parting.

Apart from that one incident, the only thing proved against the husband was that he was bad tempered, domineering and overbearing, but this was a serious matter because of its effect on the wife's health. This is what the judge said about the husband:

"I have come to the conclusion that he is a person who is inclined to be overbearing, domineering, insistent on maintaining his rights as a husband and on having the household conducted in accordance with his ideas, and that he has a hasty temper and habitually expresses himself in rather rapid unmeasured terms, which may have had an effect on the mind of the wife from time to time and tended to disturb the quietude of the matrimonial home. I am very anxious about this case because I am wondering whether, if I make an order for restitution of conjugal rights and the wife goes back, he might not be again overbearing, domineering and dictatorial, as I am satisfied he can be if he wishes to be, so that an effect can be produced on the wife's mind which may cause another break-down. I confess to anxiety in case the wife returns, but these are not matters which can weigh with me because, if the husband is entitled to the order for restitution, he ought to have it. Much though I regret it, that seems to me to be quite clearly the position here."

As I read those findings, the judge thought that the husband's domineering conduct might well have brought about his wife's first break-down, and might bring about another, but, nevertheless, she was bound to go back to him.

Before I deal with the law, I wish to say that the judge's findings of fact were amply justified by the evidence. Not only were there the inexcusable blows in December, 1948, but there was also the way the husband treated the wife after her illness. On one occasion he took the child away from her in tears. On another he told her she must come back for good or not at all. That is hardly the way to treat a wife who has borne him three children, and has only recently come out of hospital after a mental break-down. Once you accept the fact that the husband had the character and temperament described by the judge, you have an explanation of the break-down, which is otherwise unexplained. The judge clearly accepted the evidence of the doctor who attended her in that mental ward, Dr. Tweddle, who gave these answers in the course of cross-examination:

"Q.—When there is maladjustment—living together in a state of friction for years, it does sometimes produce this kind of break-down?"

A.—Yes, it could do. Q.—It could come about in a sense innocently, but it does come about nevertheless? A.—Yes. Q.—If the husband is domineering, opinionated, displays a rather violent and unreasonable temper, that sort of thing, that may produce it? A.—Yes. Q.—Quite apart from any physical violence, if it goes on long enough? A.—Yes. Q.—You do get a break-down of the weaker party? A.—Certainly.”

On the evidence so given and facts so found, I am a little surprised that the judge acquitted the husband of cruelty. It seems clear that the husband's conduct caused injury to the wife's health, or, at any rate, reasonable apprehension of it, and it can hardly be denied that it was grave and weighty, seeing that it was such as to be likely to cause a mental break-down. But the judge has expressly found that her break-down was not due to any “wrongful conduct” on the part of the husband. Having regard to his other findings, this must mean, I think, that in his domineering conduct the husband had no intent to injure or to inflict misery on the wife. It was simply a defect of temperament manifesting itself in a most unpleasant way. Now, it is well settled that an intent to injure, if not an essential element, is at any rate a most important element, in cruelty. In the absence of an intent to injure, a judge may well be justified in refusing to find cruelty: see per LORD DU PARCQ, in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (1), LORD REID in Jamieson v. Jamieson (2) and in King v. King (3), and see also the decisions of this court in Cox v. Cox (4), and Fowler v. Fowler (5), per HODSON, L.J. In these circumstances, the judge having acquitted this husband of cruelty, I do not think we can interfere with his decision on that part of the case.

The other part, the decree of restitution, is a different matter, for the judge seems to have thought that, as matter of law, once the husband was acquitted of cruelty, he was entitled to a decree of restitution. I do not think that is right. Take this very case. On the facts as found by the judge, I ask myself: Is this court bound to order the wife to return to the husband? What would be the result of such an order? Either she will return in obedience to the order, in which case she may have another mental break-down—the judge was very anxious about that. Or (what is more likely) she will refuse to return, in which case she will forfeit any right to maintenance and will at the end of three years be liable to be divorced for desertion without cause. I decline to put this poor woman to such a cruel alternative. She has borne this husband three children, and has suffered a mental break-down, through no fault of her own, that is certain, but, possibly, as the judge thinks, through her husband's conduct. The judge observed that he did not want to make an order against her to return. He said he much regretted it, but thought he had no option. I think he had an option. He ought on his findings to have refused an order for restitution.

The authorities are numerous, but there is one passage in the judgment of LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (6), which is so apt that I quote it ([1895] A.C. 390):

“Take the case of a husband who has heaped insults upon his wife, but has just stopped short of that which the law regards as saevitia or cruelty; can he when his own misconduct has led his wife to separate herself from him, come into court, and avowing his misdeeds, insist that it is bound to grant him a decree of adherence?”

That was a Scottish case, but the words of LORD HERSCHELL were accepted as good law in England by GORELL BARNES, J., in Oldroyd v. Oldroyd (7) ([1896] P. 179) which has always been regarded as laying down the law on this point. Since that time it has been repeatedly held, by some of the most eminent judges exercising this jurisdiction, that conduct which for one reason or another falls short of cruelty may, nevertheless, afford good cause for leaving and be a defence to a suit for restitution. Instances are false accusations: Russell v. Russell (8); drunkenness: Beer v. Beer (9) per SIR GORELL BARNES, P.; drunkenness and violence short of cruelty: Butland v. Butland (10) per BARGRAVE DEANE, J.; extravagance: G. v. G. (11) per HILL, J.; wife's persistent friendship with another man: Russell v. Russell (12) per BUCKNILL, J.; husband's association with other women: Glenister v. Glenister (13); and Chilton v. Chilton (14) per LORD MERRIMAN, P. In my opinion, domineering conduct comes within this principle, at any rate, when it is such as to be likely to cause a mental break-down. It may not be cruelty—it may fall short of that because of the absence of any intent to injure—but, nevertheless, it prevents the husband from getting a decree of restitution unless and until he satisfies the court that, if she returns, he will behave with conjugal kindness. He must get over his bad temper, and cease to be overbearing. The refusal of the decree does not amount to a decree of judicial separation. It only means that at present the husband cannot insist on the return of the wife. But as soon as the court is satisfied that he will behave properly, he will be entitled to it.

We were referred to Pike v. Pike (15), and, in view of some comments made on it by DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (16), I think I ought to explain some of the things I there said. In considering whether one party has good cause for leaving the other, much depends on whether the conduct complained of is of a "grave and weighty" character or not. Conduct which is of a grave and weighty character may sometimes fall short of cruelty because it lacks the element of injury to health: as in Russell v. Russell (8) and Edwards v. Edwards (17); or because it lacks the element of intent to injure (as in the case of drunkenness or association with other women); but, nevertheless, it may give good cause for leaving, as the cases which I have cited earlier amply show. On the other hand, conduct which is not "of a grave and weighty character," and is for that reason not cruelty, does not give good cause for leaving: see Yeatman v. Yeatman (18). It is conduct of that kind to which I referred in Pike v. Pike (15) when I said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 235) that conduct "less than cruelty" does not justify a spouse in leaving. In the present case, the conduct of the husband was, I think, of a grave and weighty character, and the only reason why it was not cruelty was because there was no intent to injure. It comes, therefore, within the earlier cases to which I referred. I would allow this appeal so far as to refuse the husband a decree of restitution, but I would not disturb the judge's finding that cruelty was not established.

HODSON, L.J.: On this appeal the respondent wife appeals from a decree of restitution of conjugal rights made against her by WALLINGTON, J., on Oct. 17, 1952, and from the rejection of her prayer for divorce on the ground of the petitioner husband's cruelty. The petition for restitution was presented by the husband on May 10, 1951, his wife having left him on Apr. 13, 1951. The wife by her answer admitted the leaving, but said she had just cause for so doing by reason of the matters set out thereafter. There follows in the answer a general allegation of cruelty and a number of charges of a serious character in the main accusing the husband of violence or threats of violence. No particulars of the general allegation were given or asked for.

The parties were married in February, 1938, and they had three children, born in 1943, 1946 and 1947 respectively. The charges made in the answer begin in December, 1948, and cover the period extending to the separation in 1951 and include two matters which arose in May, 1951, after the separation. A feature of the case is that on Mar. 13, 1951, the wife was admitted to hospital in Dudley suffering from a mental break-down. She returned home discharged to the care of her husband after a fortnight, but left him finally as stated on Apr. 13. During the period of her mental illness she displayed symptoms which were, in the opinion of the doctor who saw her and gave evidence at the trial, of the nature of delusions of persecution at the hands of her husband. The charges which she made against her husband included charges not only of violence, but also of attempts and threats to murder her. One of the attempts to murder was said to be an attempt by poisoning. This was not included in the petition, but was one of the matters of which she spoke to the doctors when in the mental hospital and was repeated by her on oath in the witness box.

All the charges, with exceptions which I will mention, were dependent on the wife's uncorroborated testimony and were rejected by the judge as being incredible, although no suggestion was made by him or by counsel for the husband that she was wilfully misleading the court. The learned judge considered the character of the charges as well as her evidence given in support of them and came to the conclusion that he could not accept her evidence as accurate, quite apart from any considerations which arose by reason of her mental break-down. All of these uncorroborated charges were denied by the husband and none of the witnesses called had seen overt acts of the kind described by the wife although they had had considerable opportunity of observing the husband and wife together. I think that the learned judge was abundantly justified in arriving at this conclusion of fact. I think in referring to the character of the charges he must have been referring to the inherent improbability of murderous attacks and threats of the kind alleged.

Further, when one looks at the allegations to see whether corroboration would be likely to be forthcoming if the charges were true one finds that in two instances at least there is a noticeable absence of corroboration. For example, in para. 11 of the answer, as sworn by the wife, the following appears:

"On a day in the month of March, 1949, or the month of April at 23, Westfield Road, aforesaid, the respondent was entertaining a woman friend when the petitioner picked up a knife and told the respondent that if she did not tell her friend to go he would stick the knife through the respondent."

The wife gave evidence in support of this charge, but said that the woman friend, viz., a Mrs. Whittle, was not even present at the time when this incident occurred, but was in the house immediately before and afterwards. Mrs. Whittle was called on the husband's behalf and said that neither then nor at any other time did she see anything amiss in the husband's treatment of his wife.

Again, in para. 14, it was alleged that in March, 1951, at 23, Westfield Road, the petitioner clenched his hands round the respondent's throat saying that he would kill her before long. This incident, she said, occurred immediately before she was taken to hospital. In describing it at the trial she said that her husband put his hands round her throat to strangle her.

When she entered the hospital, she was examined for external injury and none was found such as was to be expected if anything approximating to strangulation had occurred. When tested in this way the conclusion of the learned judge is, I think, shown to be well founded so far as these two incidents are concerned. It is also a matter for comment that although these charges as originally pleaded occurred only in the period beginning in December, 1948, and ending with the termination of the married life, giving the impression that the earlier years were calm and that she was not subject to violent attacks on the part of the husband, yet when asked about the beginning of her marriage she gave evidence that her husband started round about a month after she got married, that he knocked her about and had violent fits of temper. If this were true it is at least surprising that no mention of it appears in the pleaded case, which was, I think, a different case in many respects from that put forward at the trial.

There remain for consideration those matters which were admitted by the husband. First, in December, 1948, he admitted having struck his wife with his fist on the shoulders and in the mouth. The learned judge expressed himself as follows on this matter:

A "But at the same time I am equally satisfied that although on one occasion he did act in a manner which, in my opinion, was wholly without excuse, and did in fact several times strike his wife with his fist, he is not a man to indulge in that sort of thing or in any physical violence except under very strong provocation. On one occasion there was provocation. He acted in a way which some men would have acted, and some would not. What happened was that a Dr. L. had visited him (the husband) in bed when he had an attack of influenza, and after the doctor on one occasion left his bedroom he heard whispering going on somewhere outside his bedroom and coming to the top of the staircase and looking down he there saw the doctor kissing his wife. He ran down and seizing a milk bottle, he held it above the head of the doctor as if he intended to strike him, but he says that instead of that, that is, venting his not unnatural anger on the doctor and having respect, he says, for the profession of the doctor, he telephoned to the police and then set about his wife, hitting her with his fist on both her shoulders and once on her face. So far as I can see that was the only act of violence that I can find proved in this case."

D I agree with the learned judge that the assault was wholly without excuse, but with all respect to him I do not agree with the qualifying passage tending to show that he thought there was provocation which afforded some justification. Further, I cannot agree that the finding that the husband saw the doctor kissing the wife ought to have been reached. This matter was never put to the wife in cross-examination, nor was she called to deal with it. The doctor, whose name was given in evidence, was never called as a witness, nor had he any opportunity of knowing what was alleged against him. It is on the face of it highly improbable that a professional man on leaving his patient would behave in this manner, and I should have thought that the most that could be said was that the husband thought he saw something of the sort. Whether he thought he saw this incident or actually saw it, the violent attack by this man with his fists was, as the learned judge first said, wholly unjustified, and for myself I would admit no qualification to this conclusion. When all is said, however, this incident occurred more than two years before the parting and as an act of cruelty it must be taken to be condoned, and on the case as I see it there is nothing which can be taken to revive it. The state of the wife's health in 1951 was not, according to the learned judge's finding, related in any way to the wrongful conduct on the part of the husband, and I do not think that this finding can be disturbed.

G There remain two incidents which took place after the wife had left home. She had taken with her the second child of the marriage, leaving the eldest and youngest with their father. The husband, finding the second child with her mother, took her from her mother notwithstanding that the child was crying and unhappy at being taken from the mother. On another occasion, the wife having returned home saying she would like to stay for three days, she was treated with a certain lack of kindness by the husband who said, in effect, that either she was to come home for good or not at all. Having regard to the wife's recent break-down this attitude of the husband made, not unnaturally, a bad impression on the mind of the learned judge, but did not make him reach a conclusion that cruelty had been established. In this I agree with him. The two matters I have mentioned were wholly insufficient to revive the single act of 1948 so as to establish a case of cruelty.

Having reached his conclusion on this part of the case, the learned judge came to the conclusion that there was nothing to justify his refusing a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. In this, again, I agree with him. It has been argued before us that the learned judge failed in some way to appreciate that conduct not amounting to cruelty was capable in law of amounting to just cause for a wife refusing to live with her husband. In my judgment, this question does not arise. The learned judge negatived, with one exception, any wrongful acts on the part of the husband. His criticism of the husband's character and his expressed apprehensions as to the future cannot be translated into findings adverse to the husband of overt acts, findings which he has expressly refrained from making in other parts of his judgment. Cruelty does not, so to speak, shade off into just cause.

Since some observations of mine in earlier cases have, I am afraid, given rise to difficulty, I would refer not to my own judgments, but to a judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 149) in Edwards v. Edwards (17), cited by DAVIES, J., in Dixon v. Dixon (16) ([1953] 1 All E.R. 918):

"If HODSON, J., meant to say that, once a charge of cruelty has failed to be established, it is impossible for a wife to establish grounds justifying her in refusing to live with her husband, with great respect to the learned judge, it seems to me that that decision is inconsistent with the judgments in Russell v. Russell (8) and Buchler v. Buchler (19) which this court ought to follow. I myself think that that is not what the judge meant to say. I think he meant to say in effect: 'Here is a case where the blows inflicted by the husband on the wife either amounted to cruelty in that they injured her health, or were likely to injure it, or they were not of such a nature. If they were not of such a nature then, there being no other evidence in the case to justify desertion, the court ought not to say: "Although they were, in effect, trivial blows, they justify her in leaving the husband"'. "

The just cause, which on the authorities must be proved, must be "grave and weighty": Yeatman v. Yeatman (18), per LORD PENZANCE (L.R. 1 P. & D. 494); "grave and convincing": Buchler v. Buchler ([1947] 1 All E.R. 321), per LORD GREENE, M.R. It may, as LORD PENZANCE said, be distinct from a matrimonial offence. For example, such conduct may be distinct from cruelty in that it lacks the element of causing injury to health or reasonable apprehension of the same. To that extent such conduct falls short of or is less than cruelty, to use the language that is to be found in many of the authorities, but it none the less must be grave and weighty and these attributes are not, I think, to be found as a rule in the kind of case to which BUCKNILL, L.J., was referring in the passage which I have read from Edwards v. Edwards (17).

I cannot read into the judgment of the learned judge, critical as he was of the husband's character, and anxious lest the impact of his personality on the wife might lead to another break-down of his wife's health, any justification for a finding of fact that the wife had established such misconduct on her husband's part as amounts to a grave and weighty matter justifying her in living apart from him. Moreover, medical evidence was called, but no witness said that it would be dangerous for the wife to return to her husband. She was discharged from hospital in the care of her husband when he appeared to the medical authorities to be concerned for her welfare. I would dismiss the appeal.

LLOYD-JACOB, J.: I would respectfully adopt DENNING, L.J.'s statement of the facts. The learned judge, having had the advantage of seeing and hearing the respondent, came to the conclusion that he could not accept her testimony save where it was supported by corroboration. Having so found, he came to the conclusion that this disposed of the case. I agree that, so far as concerned the respondent's cross-petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty, this finding did dispose of the matter, for the only admitted act of violence had been condoned by a period of cohabitation exceeding two years. There remained, however, the respondent wife's answer to the petition for restitution of conjugal rights. On this branch of the case, the learned judge came to the conclusion that the petitioner was a person inclined to be overbearing, domineering, and insistent on maintaining his rights as a husband to have the household conducted in accordance with his desires, and that he had a hasty temper and habitually expressed himself in rather rapid unmeasured terms, which might have had an effect on the mind of the wife from time to time and tended to disturb the quietude of the matrimonial home. He further found that the petitioner was not a man to indulge in any physical violence, except under very strong provocation. These criticisms of the petitioner as a measure of his frailty of temper are not in themselves any evidence of a matrimonial offence, and the court is concerned with them only to the extent to which they are manifested in such intolerable excess as to create grave and weighty reasons for causing this respondent to deny herself the comfort and protection of her husband and family and the matrimonial home. The learned judge had felt constrained to hold that the respondent wife's break-down in mental health had not been proved to have been due to any wrongful conduct on the part of the husband. Having regard to the absence of any evidence pointing to any other cause, this finding must be interpreted as meaning, not that the husband's conduct had no effect on the wife's mental health, but that such conduct was not shown to be wrongful. Indeed, that the former meaning was plainly intended is indicated by the learned judge's confession of anxiety should the wife obey the order and return to her husband, in which event, he said, an effect could be produced on the wife's mind which might cause another break-down.

In my judgment, the petitioner is not entitled to an order for the restitution of conjugal rights unless and until he can satisfy the court that the respondent will not be hazarding her mental health should she obey the order of the court. The preservation of her sanity is, in my judgment, a grave and weighty matter, and for the husband to behave in an overbearing, domineering and dictatorial manner, when he has once appreciated the consequences of such behaviour to her state of mind, would no longer be an exercise of his frailty, but a wickedly cruel matrimonial offence. The petitioner's conduct in relation to the removal of his second child from the mother's custody, and his rejection of his wife's offer to return to the matrimonial home for a few days, illustrate such a lack of consideration as to satisfy me that a return under an order of the court might be fraught with the gravest peril. I could not be a party to such a consequence. I would allow the appeal so far as concerns the husband's decree of restitution.

Appeal allowed in respect of the decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, dismissed in respect of the claim for a decree of divorce.

v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.J.J.),
May 11, 12, 1953.]

Legacy Duty—Exemption—“Event” occurring after commencement of Finance Act, 1949—Determination of interest—Completion of administration and distribution of estate after July 30, 1949—Finance Act, 1949 (c. 47), s. 27 (2) (b), (e).

A testator, who died on Dec. 14, 1947, and whose will was proved on Feb. 3, 1948, made common form provisions in his will for the ascertainment and distribution of his residuary estate, bequeathing shares thereof to a stranger in blood and his children absolutely. The executors claimed that no legacy duty was payable in respect of any part of the residuary estate distributed by them since July 30, 1949 (when the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27, came into operation).

HELD: it could not be said that pending completion of the administration a residuary legatee had no interest in the residuary estate beyond a mere expectancy, nor that, as a corollary, the executors had any estate or interest in the assets of which on a distribution by the executors there was a “determination” within s. 27 (2) (b) of the Act of 1949; the assent of the executors to the vesting of the estate in the legatees did not depend for its validity and effect on the testator’s will, but on the executors’ own volition, and, furthermore (a) neither the assent, nor the completion of the administration, could be said as regards each legatee to affect “the right to the legacy or the enjoyment thereof”, and (b) the distribution did not change “the nature of the property comprised” in the legacies, and, therefore, no “event” within s. 27 (2) (e) occurred on the distribution; and, accordingly, the legacy duty chargeable was not payable in connection with any of the events referred to in s. 27, and no exemption was thereby conferred.

A APPEAL by the executors of the will of Sir Hugo Cunliffe-Owen, Bart., deceased, from an order of UPJOHN, J., dated Jan. 13, 1953.

B The testator, who died on Dec. 14, 1947, and whose will was proved on Feb. 3, 1948, by his will gave directions in common form for the ascertainment and distribution of his residuary estate to the residuary legatees, who, in the events which had happened, took absolute interests. Distribution was (in part) not made before the commencement of the Finance Act, 1949, and the executors claimed that, by virtue of s. 27 thereof, any assets distributed thereafter were exempt from legacy duty. UPJOHN, J., regarded himself as bound by the decision of DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4) ([1951] 2 All E.R. 63) and, therefore, held that legacy duty was payable notwithstanding that distribution did not take place until after July 30, 1949.

C Pennycuik, Q.C., and J. A. Wolfe for the plaintiffs, the executors.
The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.) and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

D SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: On Nov. 22, 1947, the late Sir Hugo Cunliffe-Owen made his will, which was proved by the present plaintiffs on Feb. 3, 1948, the testator having died on Dec. 14, 1947. The estate was very considerable. The will made provision in a form which it is not, I think, necessary to read (but which is in what is called common form) for the ascertainment and distribution of residue among certain persons. Since the date of the death, there have, I understand, been some deeds of arrangement entered into which have affected in some degree the exact beneficial interests taken under the will. For present purposes, it is sufficient to state that half the residue went to a stranger in blood absolutely, and the other half was divided between the testator's son, who took three-quarters of it, and his two daughters who took equally the other quarter. Under the provisions of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, but having regard also to the change in the rate of legacy duty brought about by the Finance Act, 1947, the first half of the residue attracted legacy duty at the rate of twenty per cent. and the other half at the rate of two per cent.—subject in each case to the question now before the court. What I have said will indicate that the amount of duty involved in respect of residue is very considerable. It is, however, the claim of the executors in the present action that no legacy duty is payable in respect of residue or, at any rate, in respect of such part of the residue as has been distributed since July 30, 1949, or will be distributed in the future. That claim rests on the provisions of the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27, which had the effect of abolishing legacy duty and succession duty in the cases specified in the section.

G It will, I think, be convenient if I read at once substantially the whole of s. 27:

H “ (1) Legacy duty and succession duty shall not be chargeable on a legacy derived from a testator or intestate dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, [July 30, 1949] or on a succession conferred after that commencement, nor on any other legacy or succession in so far as the duty would apart from this section be payable in connection with any such event as is mentioned in the next following sub-section. (2) The events referred to in the foregoing sub-section are any of the following events happening after [July 30, 1949] that is to say—(a) the death of any person;

(b) the determination or failure of any charge, estate, interest or trust; (c) the exercise of a power of appointment; (d) the making of any payment or the application of any property, if the duty would apart from this section be chargeable . . . (e) any other event which, under the provisions of the relevant will or disposition or the rules governing the distribution of the intestate's estate, affects the right to the legacy or succession or to the enjoyment thereof or which changes the nature of the property comprised therein or any part of that property. (3) The reference in sub-s. (1) of this section to duty being payable in connection with an event shall, in relation to legacy duty, include its being payable when the legacy is paid, delivered, retained, satisfied or discharged in connection with that event, and for the purposes of this section the expression 'legacy' includes residue and share of residue."

Sub-section (4) relates exclusively to succession duty, and for the purposes of the present appeal it has been agreed between the executors and the Crown that we may confine our attention to the claim for exemption from legacy duty.

Put in a sentence, the claim of the executors in this case is that they are exempt from the liability to pay legacy duty, as I have already said, in respect of all residue distributed since July 30, 1949, and in respect of that which remains to be distributed henceforth, by virtue of the language of the section I have read and in particular by virtue of the provisions of sub-s. (2) (b) and (e) thereof. It is said (and this is the main premise on which the case rests for the executors) that pending final administration or pending some interim distribution a residuary legatee has—and I am using the language of counsel for the executors—only an expectancy in the eye of the law, i.e., a right at most to receive in the future whatever may be found available when provision has been made for debts and other obligations or when such debts and other obligations have been satisfied. It is only, say the executors, on the occasion of an actual distribution, or, alternatively, when administration is complete, that the interest of the residuary legatee ripens into or becomes a possessory interest. Only then does he become entitled to enjoy (in part or wholly) the subject-matter of his legacy. It, therefore, follows, say they, that when a distribution is made an interest or estate which previously existed in the executors "determines" within the meaning of sub-s. (2) (b). Alternatively, it is said that on an assent to a partial distribution, or on the final winding-up of the estate, an "event" occurs under para. (e) which under the provisions of the will of this testator either affects the right of the residuary legatee to the legacy or to the enjoyment of the legacy or which changes the nature of the property of which the legacy consists. It follows, therefore, say they, that, if the determination or the event, as the case may be, occurs after July 30, 1949, exemption from legacy duty in respect of what is distributed is afforded by virtue of s. 27. The premise which I have tried to state depends in turn very largely on certain expressions used in the House of Lords in such cases as Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1) and Barnardo's Homes v. Income Tax Special Comrs. (2), and also on expressions of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Corbett v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), to which cases I shall have to return presently. The problem presented must in the end turn on the construction, according to their ordinary sense, of the words which have been used in this particular section. No one who has attended to the argument presented to this court will, I imagine, be willing to say that the problem is other than difficult.

The Solicitor-General, in presenting the case for the Crown, drew attention to the fact that the relevant language which I have already read is not the first expression of the kind on the part of Parliament. I referred a short time ago to the circumstance that by the Finance Act, 1947, legacy duty was doubled, and s. 49 of the Act of 1947, in achieving that process of duplication, used exactly the same language in sub-s. (3) as Parliament used again when it sought to put an end to legacy duty in the Finance Act, 1949, s. 27 (2). It spoke, in 1947, of "events" in connection with which legacy duty was payable and it specified the same series of events as is specified in s. 27 (2) of the Act of 1949. Since both Acts relate to the same subject-matter, viz., legacy duty, it is, I assume legitimate for the court, in trying to solve the problem of construction, to pay regard, if it is of assistance, to the earlier expression of Parliamentary intention. Counsel for the Crown made the point that if the argument presented in this court is correct, it would follow (and I think counsel for the executors did not shrink from this result) that the question whether in any particular case legacy duty at double the previous rate would be payable would or might depend on the exact date when executors chose to assent to a legacy or when they had completed the administration of their estate. It was said that it would be a surprising result, that the amount of duty should depend on an accidental circumstance of that kind, or if accidental circumstance be not an entirely correct phrase, on a matter so much in the discretion of the executors in the performance of their administrative duties. Still, the question is: What has been said by Parliament and what is the effect of the language they have used? I say no more, therefore, on the earlier Act than this (and what may be said about that Act equally may be said about this Act) that, to my mind, at first sight, it is remarkable that (if the executors are right) the incidence of double duty in the one case and exemption in the other should depend on events of the character which I have mentioned, viz., the decision of executors to make a partial or final distribution or on their having completed the process of administration which, as everybody knows, may be prolonged for good or other reasons over a great length of time. The problem none the less is, as I have just said, a question what is the sensible meaning of the language used.

When the matter came before UPJOHN, J., he regarded himself as bound by an earlier decision in Re Gibbs (4), in which DANCKWERTS, J., construed the relevant provisions of this section in a sense which was fatal to the subject in that case. I have come to the conclusion that the decision of DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4), was correct and that he rightly construed the relevant provisions of this somewhat difficult section, but it is plainly due to the careful arguments to which we have attended that I should state my own reasons for that conclusion though I am, in large measure, content to adopt the language used by DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4).

First, I must say something about Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1), Barnardo's Homes v. Income Tax Special Comrs. (2), and Corbett v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3) which, as I have said, largely form the basis of the arguments which the executors have put forward.

In the Sudeley case (1) the question was whether one who was entitled to residue under the will of another, but who had died before the completion of the administration of that other's estate, was to be treated as having acquired an interest as residuary legatee in certain specific assets which were situate in New Zealand (for if so those assets would not be subject to English duty on the legatee's death), or whether the residuary legatee must be treated as having an interest generally in the estate of the first testator which was being wound up in England and in respect of which, as an English asset, duty would be leviable in this country. The House of Lords decided in favour of the latter view. In the course of his reasons LORD HERSCHELL (to take his speech as an example) pointed out ([1897] A.C. 18) that, administration not being completed, the legatee had no "estate, right, or interest, legal or equitable" in the specific New Zealand real property.

In the Barnardo's case (2) a similar view was the basis of the decision that sums paid on account (pending the completion of the administration) to the charity, Dr. Barnardo's Homes, which consisted in fact of income from which tax had been deducted, could not be treated as being or as having been the income of the charity so as to enable the charity to claim a return of the income tax as having been paid on the charity's behalf. Again (and I need not refer to the precise language of the speeches, particularly that of VISCOUNT FINLAY which was later quoted in the Corbett case (3)) the decision rested on the view that the legatee, Dr. Barnardo's Homes, could not, in the circumstances, say that it was entitled to any of the items of property out of which their legacy was ultimately payable. Those two cases, as it seems to me, taken by themselves, do not carry the executors the distance which they seek to be carried. It is one thing to say that, pending final administration, a residuary legatee is not entitled to any estate, right, or interest whether legal or equitable in any specific item of property, but it is another thing to say (and it does not follow from the first proposition, in my opinion) that pending administration the residuary legatee has no interest in the estate at all or is enjoying a mere expectancy. A

In the case in this court of Corbett v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), there is certain language which, read apart from its context, might appear to go somewhat further. Before, therefore, I refer to it I draw attention to cases such as Cooper v. Cooper (5), to which counsel for the Crown referred, for that case seems to me to refute the proposition which is said, as I venture to think erroneously, to flow from Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1) and Barnardo's Homes v. Income Tax Special Comrs. (2), viz., the proposition that pending final administration and distribution the residuary legatee has no title or interest at all in residue. If it is thought that cases such as Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1) and Barnardo's Homes (2) are not easily reconcilable with Cooper v. Cooper (5) (which was not, in fact, cited in Lord Sudeley's case (1)), the solution, as it seems to me, can be found in the language which YOUNGER, J., used in Vanneck v. Benham (6). YOUNGER, J., there used language which I respectfully adopt and to which, indeed, I do not desire to add anything of my own. After saying that it was unfortunate that Cooper v. Cooper (5) was not cited in Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1), and also that Lord Sudeley's case (1) was not cited in Blake v. Bayne (7), he goes on ([1917] 1 Ch. 76): B C D

"But I think it is not difficult to arrive at the true distinction between the two lines of authority which at first sight may seem to be in conflict. The distinction, it appears to me, is that an interest in an intestate's estate is sufficiently specific to raise a case of election, [which was the Cooper case (5)] representing as that interest does all the money's worth of the property comprised therein, but that such interest is not sufficiently specific, apart from agreement with the next of kin where there are more than one, to enable any one of the next of kin to say to the administrator 'This or that thing is mine. Hand it over to me'." E F

In Corbett v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., had referred to what had been said in the Barnardo case (2) and went on ([1937] 4 All E.R. 704): G

"It is quite obvious from that observation that, in the view of VISCOUNT BUCKMASTER, at any rate, the principle underlying the Barnardo case (2) was not a limited principle turning entirely on the precise language of the provisions of the Income Tax Act relating to the exemption of charities. He read it, as I read it, as deciding the case of the charity concerned upon the larger principle that, until the residue is ascertained in the due course of administration, the beneficiaries have no title to that residue." H

If the learned Master of the Rolls had said "have no title to residue" instead of "to that residue", I think counsel for the executors might well have fastened on such language as supporting the underlying principle on which he sought to rely, but I think in the context SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R. meant no more than that, as was, indeed, pointed out in the Lord Sudeley case (1), until residue had been finally ascertained, the beneficiaries could not say as respects any or all of the items which eventually made it up: "This or that is mine. Hand it to me". Later, SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said (ibid., 705):

"But, in the case of executors, it is not true to say (and this is how I read the opinion of VISCOUNT FINLAY) [in the Barnardo case (2)] that the income, when received by executors pending the conclusion of the administration, is the income of the beneficiaries in that sense."

A Again, I think the last three words make clear that the Master of the Rolls was not seeking to go at all beyond what had been laid down in the two House of Lords cases. In my judgment, the same observation may again be made with regard to the language used where SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., came to his conclusion on the effect of the rule in Allhusen v. Whittell (8), and he used the words (ibid., 707):

B "In my opinion, the existence of the rule in Allhusen v. Whittell (8) cannot alter the fundamental fact that, during the period of administration, the income is the executor's income and nobody else's. As LORD ATKINSON said, and as had been pointed out by LORD STERNDAL, M.R., and by ATKIN, L.J. (as he then was), in the Court of Appeal, the residue does not exist until the estate is cleared."

C I cannot, therefore, accept the proposition that either on the authority of the cases referred to or otherwise, pending final administration, or pending a partial distribution, the residuary legatee has no interest in residue beyond what counsel for the executors has called a mere expectancy. I think his title to the residue is there from the start and, indeed, the Sudeley case (1) shows that if he should die before he actually comes into possession of it his estate will be liable to pay duty on the value of that interest in residue ascertained as best may be in the circumstances. The effect, undoubtedly, of the conclusion of administration or of a partial distribution is to enable the legatee to say, and to say for the first time as regards the subject-matter distributed: "This particular property is now mine".

E With that introduction, and having stated what I believe to be the limits of the proposition for which Sudeley's case (1) and Barnardo's case (2) are authorities, I turn to consider the argument which, as I have stated, turns on para. (b) and para. (e) of s. 27 (2) of the Act of 1949. I take first para. (b). Can it be said that when a partial distribution or a final distribution is made, then there is within the meaning of this sub-section the "determination" of an estate or interest? In his opening speech counsel for the executors put his

F emphasis on the submission that since, quoad the subject-matter distributed, the beneficiary had, pending the distribution, no beneficial interest in it, there, therefore, must be inferred and there must exist an equitable interest in the subject-matter so distributed, which equitable interest belonged to the executors until the moment of distribution, but then determined. I think that in approaching the construction of this sub-section it is legitimate to note that the various

G instances given seem to me, at any rate, prima facie, to be referable to beneficial interests of some kind or another. After all, the sub-section is dealing with events in connection with which legacy duty is or would, but for the section, be payable, and legacy duty is payable (putting it quite broadly) when the legatee gets his legacy. The phrase "determination or failure of an estate or interest" is one commonly met with in conveyances and documents of that

H kind and would, I think, prima facie, be treated as appropriate to beneficial interests of some sort or another. It seems to me, I confess, as a matter of language, that even if an equitable estate in the executors does come to an end on the happening of the event in question, it would be an inappropriate use of language to speak of that event as "determining" such an interest in the executors. But I do not think it right to regard the estate of an executor, pending distribution, as having some equitable quality as well as, but distinct from, the legal estate which, undoubtedly, is vested in the executors. I do not think it right to suppose that every piece of property must have in it the double characteristic of a legal and an equitable estate. The equitable estate in the sense of a proprietary interest which exists and is treated in these courts as existing in many species of property is, in many cases, no more than the consequence of the circumstance that the person entitled to it has during the development of our equity been treated as entitled to particular equitable remedies. It is obvious, in any event, that the executors have no beneficial interest. Their duty is to apply the assets in their hands in due course of administration. I do not, therefore, accept the view that there is any "equitable interest" in the executors which can be fairly said to determine when they hand over any part of the residue.

In the course of his reply, counsel for the executors fastened rather on something which had been said on the other side and said that what determined was what was called in Attenborough v. Solomon (9) in the House of Lords (to which case I will come back presently) the plenum dominium of the executors. Pending distribution, all the items making up the estate are in the plenum dominium of the executors. They have a good title, e.g., to charge them for the purpose of raising money. When they hand any asset over to the legatee it is obvious that the dominium then comes to an end. Equally, the plenum dominium would come to an end if they paid a creditor, so far as the subject-matter handed over is concerned. As a matter, therefore, of the language used, and without attempting to expound the matter any further, it seems to me that sub-s. (2) (b), in speaking of the "determination . . . of any . . . estate [or] interest", is not directed to and is not fairly descriptive of that which happens when an executor parts with assets which were formerly in his hands by handing them over, in the course of partial distribution or otherwise, to a residuary legatee. I, accordingly (construing the paragraph as I have tried to do according to its ordinary significance), reject the argument that on payment to a residuary legatee there can fairly be said to occur a "determination of estate or interest".

There remains, however, para. (e) which has seemed to me to present a more difficult problem, and so, I gather, DANCKWERTS, J., also thought. I shall be forgiven, I hope, if I read it again in order to state what is the argument on para. (e):

"any other event which, under the provisions of the relevant will . . . affects the right to the legacy . . . or to the enjoyment thereof or which changes the nature of the property comprised therein . . ."

Again, I think (though counsel for the executors will not, I trust, regard me as saying this in any critical sense), that the argument of the executors somewhat shifted its emphasis in reply from what it had been when opened, for the emphasis put by counsel in opening was rather on the final completion of administration as constituting the "event" within the meaning of the paragraph. In reply, he was content to take as the "event" the assent by the executor to the vesting in the legatee in possession of the whole or any part of the subject-matter of his legacy—a shifting of emphasis which may have been due in no small measure to an argument put forward by junior counsel for the Crown, to which I shall refer in a moment. I venture to repeat, in approaching this question, what I have already indicated, viz., that without desiring to lay it down that the "other event" must be necessarily ejusdem generis with those mentioned in para. (a), para. (b), para. (c) and para. (d), still, as a first impression created on my mind by the sub-section, I should not expect to find that the "event" in para. (e) is a purely administrative act. But whatever the event is, it must (according to the paragraph) be an event which under the provisions of the will, has a certain effect. Junior counsel for the Crown pointed out that an assent by an executor is something which may be, and in strictness frequently is, altogether unrelated to any direction which the will may contain. Whatever the will may say, the executor has a duty to administer the estate, pay the creditors, and so forth, and he may decide at any point of time to assent to any part of any legatee's legacy being handed over to that legatee. He may do so if he wishes without having the assets or any single asset sold, notwithstanding the most comprehensive trusts for sale which he may find in the will.

A The point is made clear by VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in his speech in Attenborough v. Solomon (9). The question in that case was whether the executor of the will there in question was still acting in that capacity when he pledged certain property of his testator. If Mr. Solomon was still an executor, then his right to pledge was unquestioned. If, however, he had ceased to be an executor and had become a trustee, then no less plainly he had no right whatever to pledge the particular asset. The particular transaction took place some fourteen years after the testator's death, but it was argued that, since sometimes B administration continues for a very long period of time, the court ought to treat Mr. Solomon as being still an executor when he made the particular pledge. It is in connection with that submission that the language which I am about to cite from LORD HALDANE was used. He said ([1913] A.C. 81):

C " . . . the meaning of a residuary account must of course be construed with reference to its purpose. It is not a document which is intended to have the operation of a declaration of trust; but it may be looked at as against the executor as evidence of what he regarded as being the position of the estate. I think it is plain from that document that Mr. J. D. Solomon regarded the debts as having been all paid and the estate as ready to be held upon the trusts of the will which affected it in the hands of the trustees . . . D The general principles of law which govern this case are not doubtful. The position of an executor is a peculiar one. He is appointed by the will, but then, by virtue of his office, by the operation of law and not under the bequest in the will, he takes a title to the personal property of the testator, which vests him with the plenum dominium over the testator's chattels. He takes that, I say, by virtue of his office. The will becomes operative so far E as its dispositions of personalty are concerned only if and when the executor assents to those dispositions."

As LORD HALDANE observed, the question whether an assent has taken place, whether there has been full administration, is a question of fact depending on the executor's determination, and may often be a matter of fact not at all easy to ascertain or determine with precision. If that is so, it lends some F colour, at any rate, to the view which I take that para. (e) is not likely to be referring to an event so uncertain and difficult of precise definition.

The question is, having particular regard to the language used by LORD HALDANE: Can it be said that an assent is an "event" under the provisions of the will within the meaning of para. (e)? In a sense it can, no doubt, be said, as G counsel for the executor said in this case, that the executors were carrying out the directions of the will. Still, I think the point made by junior counsel for the Crown is well founded. The assent really is something which depends for its validity and effect, not on the provisions of the will, but on the executor's own volition in the conduct by him of his duties of administration according to the general law. But, further, I am also of opinion that the assent or the final administration, whichever event is regarded, cannot strictly be said to "affect H the right to the legacy or to the enjoyment thereof". I do not, of course, forget that on the assent taking effect the legatee for the first time is entitled to say, as regards the property distributed: "This now is mine". From that point of time he enjoys a possession of that property, but still, according to the language used, it seems to me that what is here spoken of is an event which affects something which was already pre-existing. I have already said that as a matter of law I think the right to the legacy previously existed, and existed from the testator's death. The actual or physical enjoyment may spring up from the moment of the distribution, but then, if it did not exist before, the event in question cannot fairly be said to have "affected" it.

Finally, it was said that the "event" of distribution or the final winding-up "changed the nature of the property comprised" therein. I also reject that argument. Those words, in my judgment, refer to something which changes the nature of the property as distinct from the interest in it. For example, in the case of heirlooms, if a sale takes place, then the nature of the subject-matter of the legacy changes and that is a circumstance very relevant to the liability to pay duty. But in a case such as the present the nature of the property distributed is, in point of fact, identical immediately before and immediately after the assent. The assent itself does not affect the nature of the property which is the subject of the distribution.

For these reasons I reject all the arguments based on para. (e), but I think further force is added to the contrary contention by sub-s. (3), and as regards the effect of that sub-section, I am, for my part, content to adopt what was said by DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4). Before I read that part of his judgment, I would also like to read and adopt (because it is, in my judgment, correct) what the learned judge said on the more general question. DANCKWERTS, J., said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 68):

" . . . it seems to me that the title of the residuary legatee to a residuary estate remains the same both before and after the completion of administration notwithstanding that it is not until it is complete that he can say that any particular asset or any particular income is his and not merely part of the general estate of the testator."

In my judgment, that is a correct summary of the conclusion on the general argument. The learned judge then goes on to deal with sub-s. (3) (ibid.):

"When I turn to sub-s. (3) which refers back, not to sub-s. (2), but to sub-s. (1), it seems to me that the argument which was put forward by counsel for the Crown that the administrative act was not an event within the meaning of the section is plainly right. It would have been easy for the legislature, if they had so intended, to say that the reference to duty being payable in connection with an event should be a reference to duty being payable in connection with the payment, delivery, retainer, satisfaction, or discharge of the legacy. That would have brought in the rules about payment which are contained in the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, but that is not what the sub-section says. The sub-section refers to the duty being payable in connection with the event. Then, when s. 27 deals in sub-s. (3) with delivery and retainer, the words are 'shall, in relation to legacy duty, include its being payable when the legacy is paid, delivered, retained, satisfied or discharged in connection with that event . . .'"

In other words, the event is something different from the "delivery, retainer, satisfaction, discharge or payment". As I have said, I respectfully adopt that part of the learned judge's judgment which seems to me somewhat strongly to support the view that an assent or a retainer (which is in effect the same thing) is not an event within the contemplation of para. (e).

A point was taken during the argument in connection with sub-s. (3). Counsel for the executors noted that the word used is "include" and not "mean". I agree that according to the ordinary sense of the language "include" is a word of expansion. It is, I agree, difficult to think of any case in which legacy duty might be payable strictly "in connection with" one of the events stated in sub-s. (2), without recourse to the exposition in sub-s. (3). My answer is that the word "include" may well have been used ex abundanti cautela, and in any revenue statute I think caution may be easily justified. Other points I shall, I hope, be forgiven for not mentioning in detail, but, as regards para. (e), I should add that, in my judgment, no help can be got from the phrase "the rules governing the distribution of the intestate's estate", for, as I think, those words refer to Part IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and do not, therefore, serve to introduce the language of Part III which contains the purely administrative matters provided for in that Act. If those administrative events were introduced, it might, no doubt, assist the executors to say that the "event" stated in para. (e) might, at any rate, include a purely administrative event. As I say, however, in my judgment, the rules referred to are rules for the beneficial devolution of an intestate's estate which are to be found in Part IV of the Act of 1925.

For the reasons which I have stated I think that the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4) was correct and that UPJOHN, J., was, therefore, right in dismissing the present action.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. Stripped of all trimmings, the executors' argument came to this, that on any legacy paid after the Act of 1949 no legacy duty is payable. As a corollary, they admitted that on any legacy paid after the Act of 1947 and before the Act of 1949 double duty was payable. All I would say is that, if that was the intention of the legislature, there would have been nothing easier than to say it, and they have not said it. Apart from that, it would be most capricious to give such an operation to the Act because it would mean that the incidence of duty would depend on the expedition or the dilatoriness of the executors.

Counsel for the executors relied, first, on s. 27 (2) (b) of the Act of 1949. When counsel opened the case, he asserted that until the executors had administered the testator's estate they had the entire legal and equitable interest in the property comprised in it, and that when they completed the administration and became trustees, then there was a "determination or failure" of their equitable interest and, therefore, an event within s. 27 (2) (b). He relied on Lord Sudeley v. A.-G. (1). I entirely dissent from that proposition. An executor has, of course, the legal interest in the property, but he has not the equitable or beneficial interest. Subject to the payment of duties, the legatees have the beneficial interest in it, and they have that interest from the date of the death. When the estate is administered the interest remains intact. It does not fail or determine.

Secondly, counsel relied on s. 27 (2) (e). He said that when the executors gave their assent to a legacy, that assent "affected the right to the legacy or to the enjoyment thereof" and, therefore, was an event within the paragraph. As to that, I would say the right of a legatee to his legacy, whether specific or residuary, arises on the death, but it can be asserted only by calling on the executor to do his duty: Cooper v. Cooper (5). The assent by the executor does not affect the nature of the right or even the enjoyment of it. It only links the right to specific property. It is merely the occasion when the right is realised. This distinction—between the right itself and the realisation of it—is one well known to the law. It is repeatedly taken in the cases where a debt is said to be debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro, and is illustrated by Re D'Avigdor-Goldsmid (10) in the House of Lords. It seems to me that on this question of "affecting enjoyment thereof", the answer is that the assent may affect the enjoyment of the property comprised in the right, but it does not affect the enjoyment of the right itself. For these reasons I entirely agree with the judgment which my Lord has proposed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree and have very little to add. In the course of the executors' opening, counsel suggested, as I understood it, that there is always some equitable element or interest attaching to the ownership of property. I cannot accept that at all. It is quite true that there are certain interests in property which were the creation of the courts of equity and certain remedies which the courts of equity evolved, but to say that there is always an element of equitable title in the ownership of property is, in my opinion, unsound.

Starting from that premise, it was then suggested that an executor during the period of administration has not only the legal interest in the assets, but also some kind of equitable interest (not amounting to a beneficial interest) which the court would cease to recognise when the estate is cleared. For my part, I cannot see of what that interest can be said to consist. If there is such an interest, presumably it would be capable of definition and no satisfactory explanation either of its nature or of its quality was forthcoming in the course of the argument. In my opinion, the executors have no equitable interest during the period of administration in the manner that was suggested.

As an alternative way of putting it, it was said that every time the executor assents to a pecuniary legacy or to the payment or retention of a share of the residue, there is pro tanto a determination or failure of the executors' estate or interest in the assets. If that be so, there would be a succession or series of determinations or failures of that character as the executors paid the debts and legacies. I am quite satisfied that that was very far removed from the conception which the legislature had in its mind in enacting s. 27 (2) (b). The language there, "the determination or failure of any charge, estate, interest or trust" is well-known language signifying a reference to beneficial interests as, indeed, in my opinion, is the language of para. (a), para. (c) and para. (d) as well. It is my view that all these specific events enumerated there are referable to beneficial interests and are not in the least directed to mere acts of administration. I think myself that para. (e), which starts with the words "any other event", in itself casts some light on para. (a), para. (b), para. (c) and para. (d), and that they themselves cast some light on para. (e). DANCKWERTS, J., rather applied the ejusdem construction to para. (e), having regard to the opening words which I have mentioned—"any other event", and I think he was right. Apart from that phrase, which would tend to bring forward into para. (e) the beneficial elements which are derived from para. (a) to para. (d), one then finds in para. (e) a reference to "rules governing the distribution of the intestate's estate". It seems to me to be reasonably plain, as my Lord has indicated in his judgment, that that is a reference to Part IV of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which is entitled: "Distribution of residuary estate", which means the residuary estates of intestates and is not referable to Part III which is entitled "Administration of assets". The word "rules" is a curious word to use, but it seems to me to be quite in conformity with the view that it is a reference to Part IV and does not bring in the totality of the provisions of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which relate to administration and distribution generally. Had it referred generally to the provision as to intestates' estates, it might have been more adapted to that purpose. So I think myself that, taking para. (a), para. (b), para. (c) and para. (d) both by themselves and also in conjunction with para. (e), the conclusion is that the events in all of these subsidiary provisions are referable and referable alone to events of a beneficial character. If that be so, it is enough to dispose of the suggestion that an assent is an event within the meaning of para. (e) because that is merely an act of administration, but, apart from that, the point which, I think, is quite decisive against the executors on para. (e) is that the event must be one which is an event under the provisions of the will. For the reasons to which junior counsel for the Crown referred (supported as they are by what VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., said in Attenborough v. Solomon (9), and the further observations of this court in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Smith (11)) it appears to me to be virtually impossible to say that an assent by executors is a provision under the will. It is nothing of the kind. It is an administrative act imposed by the law on executors which they are bound to perform, regardless of anything in the will contained, and which is so far removed from being a provision of the will that none of the beneficial provisions of the will come into operation at all until the assent has been given. Therefore, if it is said that the assent is a provision under the will which affects the right to the legacy, one looks to the will, and one looks in vain, to find a provision there which could be regarded as having the result for which the executors contend. I think that point is decisive on para. (e) and I say no more about it.

In conclusion, I would like to associate myself with what my Lord said and to express my complete concurrence with the passage in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J., in Re Gibbs (4), where he said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 68):

"... it seems to me that the title of the residuary legatee to a residuary estate remains the same both before and after the completion of administration notwithstanding that it is not until it is complete that he can say that any particular asset or any particular income is his and not merely part of the general estate of the testator."

B If I may respectfully say so, that appears to me to be a lucid and entirely accurate statement of the law in that respect. I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

JENNINGS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. MIDDLESBROUGH CORPORATION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), April 29, 30, May 20, 1953.]

Income Tax—Profits—Profits arising from ownership and occupation of land—Town hall used for activities in the nature of trade—No apportionment of profits between trade and ownership of land—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. A, sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 5.

A municipal corporation carried on three classes of activities at their town hall: the organisation of public dances, roller skating, and the hiring out of the hall for meetings of charitable and religious societies and political bodies. Charges for dancing and roller skating were made which covered a band (or music from gramophone records), lighting, heating, and sitting-out accommodation, and there were also provided, at an extra charge, refreshments, cloak-room accommodation, and the hire of skates. Charges for the hire of the hall for meetings covered provision of chairs and heating, and small additional charges were made for stewards, cloak-room attendants and lighting, if required. The corporation made a profit on these activities.

HELD: no apportionment of the profits fell to be made between those referable to the provision of chattels and services and those (covered by the sched. A assessment) referable to the exploitation of the corporation's right of property in the town hall, the whole of the profits being assessable under Case I of sched. D, with an allowance therefrom, by virtue of r. 5 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, of the amount of the sched. A assessment of the town hall.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax. B

The Middlesbrough Corporation appealed against assessments to income tax for 1938-39 to 1946-47 inclusive made on them under sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of profits arising from activities in relation to their town hall. Such activities comprised hiring the hall out for meetings and other gatherings, the organisation of public dances in the hall, and the organisation of roller skating for the public in the crypt. In connection with all three activities, the corporation provided the necessary services such as seating, lighting, heating, a dance band, refreshments and cloak-room facilities. They made charges to persons hiring the hall and to members of the public admitted thereto for dancing and roller skating, and the total charges after deducting all expenditure resulted in each year in a profit. The assessments were made on the footing that the whole of this profit was assessable to income tax under sched. D, subject to a deduction in respect of the net annual value of the hall assessed under sched. A. The corporation contended that the profits fell to be apportioned as between (i) those referable to the corporation's exploitation of their right of property in the hall, which they contended was covered by the sched. A assessment on the hall, and (ii) those referable to the provision of chattels and services which alone fell to be assessed under sched. D. The Crown contended that the corporation's activities at the hall constituted a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade, the whole of the profits of which were chargeable to income tax under Case I of sched. D, subject only to an allowance in respect of the annual value of the hall prescribed by r. 5 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, and that no such segregation or apportionment of profits as the corporation claimed fell to be made. The commissioners found that the corporation's activities were conducted regularly, systematically and on commercial principles, and constituted the carrying on of a concern in the nature of trade the profits of which were assessable to income tax under Case I of sched. D, and that the differences between the three activities were differences of degree and not of principle. They held that, on the authority of the reasoning of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Croft v. Sywell Aerodrome, Ltd. (1) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 110), the profits under all three heads must be apportioned between those referable to the corporation's exploitation of their right of property in the hall, covered by the sched. A assessment on the hall and excluded from the sched. D assessment, and those referable to the provision of chattels and services. They apportioned the profits totalling in nine years £31,415, between services, £10,996, and property, £20,419. The Crown appealed. C

Cur. adv. vult.

May 20. UPJOHN, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax who directed that an apportionment be made of profits accruing to the respondent corporation in respect of certain activities carried on by them in their town hall, the relevant years of assessment being from 1938-39 to 1946-47 inclusive. The law was then altered in the Finance Act, 1948, and the point which I have to decide cannot, I understand, arise for the future.

A In 1887 the corporation created a fine town hall in the then fashionable neo-Gothic style. The hall is a large one and contains a hall capable of seating some sixteen hundred persons and under it a crypt. The hall is not used for meetings of the town council or for the purpose of transacting its day-to-day business, for there are separate council offices, but the primary object of building the hall was to use it for civic functions, though in practice it is not so used very often. During the relevant years of assessment it was used, perhaps, some six times in the year for elections, meetings relating to air raid precautions, B mayor's receptions, or occasionally even a Hallé concert. During that period the corporation, no doubt with the laudable purpose of saving the ratepayers' money and providing amenities for them and their children, were accustomed to organise and run public dances some three times a week, making a small charge of 1s. 6d. per person on Tuesdays and Thursdays and 3s. on Saturdays. For this a band was provided by the corporation and, of course, lighting, C heating, sitting-out accommodation and so on. In addition, refreshments and cloak-room accommodation were available at small extra charges. In the crypt, the corporation twice a week, on Mondays and Wednesdays, provided roller skating facilities, the charge for admission being 1s. 6d. per person, which covered lighting, heating and music from gramophone records. Refreshments, cloak-room accommodation and the hire of roller skates were available at small additional charges. Furthermore, the corporation made a practice of licensing D the use of the hall to various societies, charitable and religious, to hold meetings. It was also used for such purposes as school speech days, police social parties and meetings of political bodies. Fees were charged for this to such bodies requiring the use of the hall according to a scale. The fees so paid included provision of chairs and heating, but stewards and cloak-room attendants and lighting when required were available at slight additional charges.

E As a result of those activities the Special Commissioners have held as a fact, and there was no dispute about that before me, that the corporation were during the relevant years of assessment carrying on on their property, the town hall, a concern in the nature of trade which is assessable to income tax under Case I of sched. D. The question I have to consider is whether the profits of such trade ought to be apportioned between the activities referable to the provision of chattels and services, e.g., chairs for meetings, bands for dancing, F roller skates and music for skating, on the one hand, and the activity referable to the exploitation of the corporation's right of property in the town hall, on the other hand. The Special Commissioners, conceiving themselves bound by some observations of the Master of the Rolls in Croft v. Sywell Aerodrome, Ltd. (1), have held that an apportionment must be made. The whole question G is whether that is right. The Special Commissioners have prepared a supplemental Case Stated making an apportionment, but I am not concerned with the detailed figures, and the Crown, although not agreeing with the accuracy of the figures, felt they could not properly challenge them before me.

H The Crown's case is a perfectly simple one. They submit that the corporation, who are admittedly in occupation of the town hall, are assessable to tax on the profits of the whole of their activities. They submit that there is no room for making any apportionment, for that matter is dealt with by r. 5 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, which (as amended by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 36 (1)) is in these terms:

"(1) The computation of tax shall be made exclusive of the annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages occupied for the purpose of the trade or profession and separately assessed and charged under sched. A . . . (2) Where, in estimating the amount of annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation and chargeable to tax under this schedule, any sum is deducted on account of the annual value of the lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages used for the purpose of such trade, profession, employment, or vocation, the sum so deducted shall not exceed the amount of the assessment of the lands, tenements, hereditaments and heritages for the purpose of tax under sched. A as reduced for the purpose of collection."

They submit that the scheme of the Act is that, where a subject remains in occupation of his property and carries on trade thereon, he is, of course, exercising his beneficial rights in the property and to that extent he is exercising rights on which he is being taxed under sched. A. Therefore, when one comes to compute the profits of the activities carried on on such property, it is not fair that the subject should be taxed again, and so provision is made by r. 5 to deduct the sched. A tax. That submission is supported by Coman v. Rotunda Hospital, Dublin (Governors) (2). That case was very similar to the present case, and on the facts the commissioners found, and, in my judgment, found correctly, that the Rotunda case (2) was indistinguishable from the present. That case depended on the Income Tax Act, 1842, but it is agreed that the relevant provisions were the same as in the Income Tax Act, 1918. The headnote was as follows ([1921] 1 A.C. 1):

"The governors of a hospital let out certain rooms contiguous to the hospital for entertainments for periods varying from one night to six months at charges which included the use of heating and seating and applied the profits arising from these lettings to the general support of the hospital:—Held, that these profits were assessable to income tax under sched. D as being profits arising from a concern in the nature of trade within Case I, and were not within any of the exemptions conferred by the Income Tax Acts by reason of their being applied to charitable purposes or otherwise. Decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland reversed."

The question arose incidentally whether the assessment was properly made under Case I or Case VI. As the headnote shows, the majority of their Lordships held that it was Case I, but it was not a vital matter, for there was no suggestion of an apportionment in that case, and so there was no material difference in an assessment under either Case. That is an important matter when I come to consider the corporation's argument. VISCOUNT CAVE said (ibid., 22):

"It is pointed out, however, on behalf of the respondents that by virtue of the regulations contained in the Act of 1842 (which by s. 5 of the Act of 1853 are incorporated in that Act so far as consistent with its provisions), and particularly of r. 1 in s. 100, any profits liable to assessment under sched. A are expressly excluded from sched. D; and it is argued that the profits from the Rotunda rooms fall within that category. Accordingly, the first question to be determined is whether these profits are assessable under sched. A. It is contended that they are so assessable in one of two ways—namely, either (1) as being profits of lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages and so falling within the general description of property comprised in sched. A and within r. 1 in s. 60 of the Act of 1842, or (2) as being profits of a concern of the like nature with ironworks, gasworks and the other undertakings specified under the third heading of r. 3 in the same section. With regard to the former of these contentions, I am unable to see how the profits in question can be said to be derived from the Rotunda rooms alone. They result, not from the letting of bare rooms, but from the whole venture consisting of the equipment and disposal of the rooms with their fixtures and furniture, and the provision of the services of heating, lighting and attendance. They may perhaps be described as A profits of a trade or concern in the nature of trade, that is to say, of the business of providing and letting rooms for entertainments, and so as falling under Case I in s. 100, sched. D; but if not then they fall under Case VI as profits or gains not falling under any of the earlier rules. In some respects they resemble profits derived from letting furnished houses or apartments, which are regularly assessed under sched. D. It is no doubt true that a substantial part of the profits in question arises from the occupation and use of the tenements occupied for the purposes of the business; but this is precisely the event contemplated by the second of the rules contained in s. 100 and applicable to Cases I and II, which provides that the computation of the duty to be charged in respect of any particular trade, manufacture, adventure or concern is to be made exclusive of the profits or gains arising from lands, tenements, or hereditaments occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, and effect has been given to that rule by deducting the sched. A assessment. It may be that in the present case the share of profits so attributed to the elements in the concern other than the rooms themselves is excessive; but, if so, that is the effect of s. 9 of the Finance Act, 1898, which provides that the sum deducted under the rule above quoted is not to exceed the sched. A assessment. The hardship (if there be any) may be obviated by getting the sched. A assessment increased. As to the alternative argument, that the profits in question are assessable under para. 3 of r. 3, it is sufficient to say that the undertaking in the present case cannot be held to be 'of the like nature' with ironworks, gasworks, and the other concerns mentioned in that paragraph."

D That, in a nutshell, is the Crown's case.

The case for the corporation is this. It was clearly established by Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (3), that, where profits arise from the use of land, such as renting it, those profits are covered by the sched. A assessment, and the Crown cannot tax those profits again under sched. D. LORD ATKIN said

E ([1930] A.C. 458):

"My Lords, it may well be that another mode of expressing the result I have stated is to hold that a person capable of being assessed under sched. A cannot be said in respect of his income from land to be earning profits from 'trade'. This view appears to commend itself to some of your Lordships. I do not dissent from it, but I view it with some misgiving. I find it difficult to say that companies which acquire and let houses for the purposes of their trade, such as breweries in respect of their tied tenants and collieries, and other large employers of labour in respect of their employees, do not let the premises as part of their operation of trading. Personally I prefer to say that, even if they do trade in letting houses, their income, so far as it is derived from that part of their trading, must be taxed under F sched. A and not sched. D. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed."

G The law was altered by statute in 1940, but that is the principle.

The same principle has been expressed with felicity by LORD GREENE, M.R., in the Sywell case (1) to which I shall have to refer in detail later. He said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 113):

H "The effect of these decisions is that, where profits are referable to property or occupation, the Crown, like the subject, is bound by the statutory measure in accordance with which such profits fall to be ascertained. A further principle, I think, also emerges—namely, that, even if the profits in question are made by means of a highly organised commercial operation, such as in ordinary parlance would be described as a trading operation, the relevant schedule, be it sched. A or sched. B, must be applied. Once a profit is referable to property or occupation, it must remain in that category. It cannot be taken out of that category by calling the operation which gives rise to it a trading operation."

The corporation contend here that a large part of the profits they receive are referable to the actual use they make of their town hall, that is, the use of the hall and crypt for dancing, roller skating and meetings, and they submit, therefore, that there must be an apportionment. The Rotunda case (2), they submit, is not against them, for the point on apportionment was never taken. They rely principally on the observations of LORD GREENE, M.R., in the Sywell case (1) and on the rather earlier decision of Shop Investments, Ltd. v. Sweet (4), but I need not refer to that case, for it is fully dealt with in the Sywell case (1) by LORD GREENE.

I turn, then, to the Sywell case (1). In that case, a company, which owned an aerodrome equipped with hangars, lecture rooms, a kitchen, and other buildings, let to an aviation company at a rent a number of the buildings with the right to use the aerodrome for the flying purposes of a Royal Air Force school of flying in common with other users of the aerodrome for the term of four years from June 10, 1936, and they also granted the aviation company a licence in consideration of a yearly payment giving it the sole right to use a service hangar and the sole right to sell petrol and execute repairs to aircraft using the aerodrome. The aerodrome company also granted licences to flying clubs to use the aerodrome, and they further received income from garage rents, housing and landing fees of aeroplanes, and a percentage of the earnings of another company from the sale of ice cream. The company were responsible for keeping the aerodrome in good order and for this purpose employed a groundsman. It was held by LORD GREENE, M.R., and CLAUSON, L.J. (DU PARCQ, L.J., dissenting) that all the activities of the company at the aerodrome arose from the exercise and exploitation of their rights of property, and were, therefore, covered by an assessment to income tax under sched. A, and that the company was not assessable under sched. D, Cases I or VI. Fry v. Salisbury House Estate, Ltd. (3) and Lord Glanely v. Wightman (5) were applied, Coman v. Rotunda Hospital, Dublin (Governors) (2) and Carlisle & Silloth Golf Club v. Smith (6) were distinguished, and Shop Investments, Ltd. v. Sweet (4) approved. The first point to be noted is that all the activities of the company arose from the exercise and exploitation of their property and there was no finding of fact that the company was carrying on any trade, the provision of such services as were provided being either ancillary to the exercise of their rights of property or treated as de minimis. LORD GREENE, M.R., was at pains to point out, by reference to many examples, the difference between the exploitation of a right of property or occupation and the carrying on of the land of activities of a sort which anyone is entitled to do wherever he may be. I will read one passage only on this point from his judgment (ibid., 115):

"These considerations appear to me to provide an answer to the question why, and on what principle, a person who, for example, sets up a refreshment stall on his land, or provides services for people admitted to his land, is not exhaustively taxed under sched. A or sched. B (as the case may be) in respect of the profits so earned. Such a person, in my view, is not exploiting his rights of property or of occupation, save in the sense, and to the limited extent, that he must own or occupy the land before he can erect and carry on the refreshment stall or perform the services. The profits earned in such a case are referable, not to the exercise of the rights of property or of occupation, since the customers come on to the land for the purpose of obtaining refreshments or procuring the benefit of the services. If, on the other hand, the owner of land having (let me suppose) a remarkable view, or some historic monument, merely allows the public to come on to the land in return for an admission fee, I cannot myself see why it should be said that his profits are not covered by the sched. A assessment, since all that he is doing is to exploit his right of property by granting licences to come upon the land. The fact that he keeps the paths in order or the monument in repair in order to make a visit more attractive to the public again appears to me to make no difference, any more than does the action of the landlord of a house in keeping it in repair."

A As a matter of principle I confess that those observations seem to me to support the Crown's contention. I cannot think that LORD GREENE could have thought that any part of the profits of running a refreshment stall should be apportioned because the persons come on to the land not merely to purchase a cup of tea but incidentally to sit down and enjoy the air and the scenery while drinking it. The activity is one whole activity, viz., carrying on a trade. So, here in principle this is one trade or, possibly, three branches of one trade. The B customers of the corporation enter the town hall not merely to make use of the corporation's land but to carry on thereon activities which can be carried on on any suitable premises—holding meetings, dancing and roller skating. It could hardly be suggested that a shopkeeper who keeps a large departmental store and who by an attractive display of many different commodities all obtainable under one roof invites customers to come on his vast emporium and C to wander round the various departments could claim an apportionment of the profits of his trade because great use is made by the customers of his premises. It was said the distinction is that the profits in such a case are made from sales and not from the use of land. I do not regard the distinction as valid. In the present case the customers are buying, not goods, but the right to dance, to hold meetings or to roller skate. In all these cases the customers are making D use admittedly in varying degrees of the premises whereon these activities are carried on, but, in each case the profits result from a trade. The beneficial user of the owner's land involved in these activities is for taxation purposes taken care of by r. 5.

E I must now refer to certain observations of the Master of the Rolls in the Sywell case (1) which form the keystone of the corporation's case. After reviewing the earlier authorities, he said (ibid., 119):

"The last case was Shop Investments, Ltd. v. Sweet (4), a decision of WROTTESELEY, J., whose judgment, if I may say so, I have found particularly illuminating, and, in my opinion, manifestly correct. There the appellant company, whose business was that of acquiring and modernising properties and letting or selling the properties so modernised, F had on one occasion, contrary to their usual practice, let a cinema furnished with all its equipment and plant. Assessments were made in respect of the profits of this letting, the amount of the sched. A assessment being allowed as a deduction. The company contended, wrongly, that the profits were covered by the sched. A assessment. It also contended that the profits made by letting the furniture and so forth must be separated from the profit G made by letting the cinema building itself, for which purpose an estimate must be made of what part of the total rent was referable to the furniture and so forth. The object of this contention was, of course, to enable the company to show that a proportionate part of the rent greater than the assessed annual value was attributable to the building itself. WROTTESELEY, J., agreed with this contention, and, in my opinion, rightly so. If the H owner of a building, the assessed annual value of which is £x, can let it unfurnished for £x plus £y, he cannot be separately taxed in respect of the sum of £y. If, instead of letting it unfurnished, he furnishes it and lets it furnished for £x plus £y plus £z, to tax him on £y plus £z would be to exact double tax in respect of £y, which, as the result of the artificial measure of profits adopted under sched. A, has already in law borne tax. An apportionment such as was made in this case could, I think, have been claimed in the Rotunda case (2) and the Carlisle & Silloth Golf Club v.

Smith (6), and similar cases if the point had been considered, and if (as seems unlikely) any benefit could thereby have accrued to the taxpayer in those cases."

No doubt, it was that last sentence on which the commissioners in this case relied. In the Shop Investments case (4), it was admitted that the company fell to be assessed in respect of their letting of furniture and fittings, and the sole question was as to the method of apportionment of a gross rental which covered a lease of the cinema and of the furniture and fittings. WROTTESELEY, J., negatived the view that the company carried on the business of letting furnished cinemas: see [1940] 1 All E.R. 537; and held that it was not right to apportion the rent by attributing to the unfurnished letting element of the gross rent only such part thereof as was represented by the amount of the sched. A assessment. It was a matter of factual apportionment. The vital point, in my judgment, was that the case was not dealing with a Case I assessment at all, for the company was not carrying on a trade, so, presumably, the assessment fell to be made under Case VI, and, as there is no rule corresponding to r. 5 for cases falling under Case VI, it is a matter for apportionment in each case. With the greatest possible respect to LORD GREENE, M.R., his remarks (which were obiter) as to the possibility of making an apportionment in the Rotunda case (2) overlook this vital distinction. LORD GREENE was not himself concerned with a Case I assessment and there seems no reason to suppose that r. 5 was brought to his attention. I should normally always follow the dicta of that great master of the law, but, in this case, his remarks seem to me to be in conflict with the very terms of r. 5 and with the observations of LORD CAVE which I have read in the Rotunda case (2). In my judgment, that rule and those observations govern the present case and exclude any apportionment. The appeal of the Crown must be allowed. The matter must be remitted to the Special Commissioners with a direction that there is to be no apportionment of the profits of the trade found by them to have been carried on on the town hall, but the corporation are entitled in computing the profits of such trade in each year to deduct the amount of the sched. A assessment. The corporation must pay the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

MULREADY v. J. H. & W. BELL, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), May 12, 20, 1953.]

Negligence—Liability of contractor to servant of sub-contractor—Retention by contractor of control over performance of work—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 31 (1).

A The first defendants contracted with the second defendants to carry out work in the construction of the second defendants' factory, and made an agreement with a sub-contractor to do part of that work, comprising the installation of three ventilators in the roof. The plaintiff, a labourer employed by the sub-contractor, while engaged on the work fell seventy feet and suffered injury including the loss of a leg. He was awarded £8,500 general and special damages against the first defendants for failure to take suitable precautions to prevent his falling as required by the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 31 (1).

B HELD: the first defendants, having undertaken to carry out work which included the installation of the ventilators could not avoid their duty to ensure that reg. 31 (1) was complied with in connection with that part of the work by sub-contracting it, and, therefore, they were liable to the plaintiff.

C Dictum of LORD BLACKBURN in Dalton v. Angus (1881) (6 App. Cas. 829), applied.

D HELD, further, the damages ought to be reduced to £6,492 10s. on the ground that the general damages of about £7,600 were £2,000 higher than were usually awarded in comparable cases.

Costs—"Bullock" order—Different causes of action against two defendants—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 7.

E A "Bullock" order, requiring a defendant against whom judgment in an action has been obtained to pay the costs of a second defendant (against whom the action has been dismissed) direct to that defendant, is not an appropriate order where the plaintiff has alleged independent causes of action against the two defendants and the two breaches of duty alleged are in no way connected.

F In an action against two defendants in respect of injury suffered by the plaintiff in an accident, the claim against the second defendants, based on an alleged breach of a statutory duty to provide means to ensure his safety while working on a roof under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26 (2), was dismissed on the ground that the premises on which the accident occurred were not yet a factory within the meaning of the Act, but the plaintiff was awarded damages against the first defendants for breach of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 31 (1).

G The court made an order (a "Bullock" order) for the costs of the second defendants to be paid direct to them by the first defendants. On appeal, HELD: the order for costs must be set aside and an order made for the plaintiff to pay the second defendants' costs.

Decision of PEARSON, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 663), varied.

APPEAL by the first defendants against an order of PEARSON, J., dated July 9, 1952, made at Manchester Assizes and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 663, awarding the plaintiff £8,500 damages against the first defendants for breach of their duty to take suitable precautions against his falling from a roof on which he was working, contrary to the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 31 (1), and dismissing his claim for damages against the second defendants, for alleged breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26 (2), in failing to provide means to ensure his safety while working on the roof. PEARSON, J., also ordered the first defendants to pay the second defendants' costs direct to the second defendants.

The first defendants had contracted with the second defendants to carry out work in connection with the construction of the second defendants' factory, and had made an agreement with a sub-contractor for the carrying out of part of that work. The plaintiff was employed by the sub-contractor and was injured in the course of the execution of the sub-contractor's part of the work. His injury was found by PEARSON, J., to be due to a breach of the regulation. The first defendants contended that, the work having been carried out by the sub-contractor under the sub-contract, the first defendants were not in breach of the regulations and that the damages awarded were excessive. They also appealed by leave of PEARSON, J., against the order for the payment of the second defendants' costs on the ground that those costs should be paid by the plaintiff.

Spafford and C. N. Glidewell for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 20. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from PEARSON, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of £8,500 against the first defendants, and at the same time entered judgment for the second defendants. There is no appeal by the plaintiff against that judgment, but the first defendants appeal against the finding of the learned judge that they were liable to the plaintiff and against the amount of damages awarded. They also appeal by leave of the judge against his order directing that they should pay the costs of the second defendants, contending that those costs should be paid and borne by the plaintiff.

Dealing first with liability, Orr's Zinc White, Ltd., the second defendants, were the owners of a building which was in the course of erection. When that building is completed, it will, no doubt, be a factory within the Factories Acts as it will house plant for the production of gas. The first defendants had entered into a direct contract with the second defendants to supply and fix the sheets forming the sides and roof of the building, the steel frame of which was in course of erection by another company who do not figure in this case. The first defendants were not only to supply and fix the sheeting, but also to install three ventilators in the roof, and they found it convenient, instead of employing their own workmen, to carry out this work by a sub-contractor. Accordingly, they came to a somewhat loose arrangement with a man named Bernard Keating, who, together with his brother, had some experience of sheeting, to do the work for them. Keating was to engage and pay for what labour was required. The first defendants paid him on a piece-work basis at a standard price of so much a foot or sheet.

Keating engaged labourers, of whom the plaintiff was one. He paid them and stamped their cards, and there is no dispute that these men, including the plaintiff, were his servants and not those of the first defendants. This work seems to have been supervised by Bernard Keating's brother, Patrick, who certainly had no long experience of sheeting, as, until a year or two before the material time, his work had been that of a shop assistant.

A The contract with Keating was arranged orally. There was no written document, and the judge has found that Keating was to supply the labour and do the work while the first defendants were to supply the necessary material and equipment, except hand tools. He described the arrangement as a sub-contract of a very partial and minor character, and he found that the work was to be done under the supervision and control, and in accordance with the instructions, of the first defendants, with regard to both the work to be done and the manner in which it was to be done. We are not clear what exactly the learned judge
B meant by a sub-contract of a very partial and minor character. The sheeting and roofing of this building was a considerable job. We think he probably meant no more than that it was an informal sub-contract, and one in which the main contractor, i.e., the first defendants, retained a considerable degree of control, more than would usually be exercised where a formal sub-contract had been executed. In any case, there appears, undoubtedly, to have been a contract
C between the first defendants and Keating for the execution of a part of the work which the first defendants had undertaken for the second defendants and we propose to decide the appeal on that footing.

In the course of this work the plaintiff, who, as I have said, had been engaged and paid by Keating, fell from the roof, a distance of some seventy feet, and sustained severe injuries. It was not disputed that no suitable precautions
D had been taken to prevent him from falling, as required by reg. 31 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, made under the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937.

Turning now to the regulations, the words of reg. 4 material to this case are:

"It shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen who is undertaking any of the operations to which these regulations apply
E . . . (ii) to comply with such of the requirements of [inter alia] reg. 31 as relate to any work, act or operation performed or about to be performed by such contractor or employer of workmen."

If reference is made to the full terms of the regulation, it will be observed that the second paragraph differs in one important respect from the first which we have not set out. The first paragraph refers expressly to the observance
F of those regulations which affect workmen employed by the contractor or employer, while the second requires compliance with the requirements of certain regulations, including reg. 31, as relate to any work, act or operation performed or about to be performed by the contractor, and contains no reference to workmen employed by him. Regulation 31 (1) is in these terms:

G "Where work is done on the sloping surface of a roof and, taking into account the pitch, the nature of the surface, and the state of the weather, a person employed is likely to slip down or off the roof, then unless he has adequate hand-hold or foot-hold or is not liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches from the edge of the roof, suitable precautions shall be taken to prevent his so falling."

H Counsel for the first defendants contended that the performance of the work on the roof was here carried out by Keating as contractor and not by the first defendants, and that consequently the latter could not be held to be in breach of the regulation. He said no case was to be found in the books where a head contractor has been held liable in these circumstances, and while that appears to be so, equally there is no case which decides that he is not.

The learned judge decided this case on a somewhat narrow ground, viz., that here the first defendants had not divested themselves of the control and direction of the work so that they could be regarded as themselves performing the act of fixing the ventilators, which was what the plaintiff was actually doing when he fell. He said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 665):

"They [the first defendants] were still in effective charge and control.

I hold that they were undertaking an operation within the meaning of reg. 4, and were performing the act of fixing the ventilators."

While, in our opinion, his judgment can be supported on those grounds, for ourselves we are prepared to decide the case on the ground that the first defendants were the contractors who had agreed with the building owners to do the work, i.e., to perform the work on the roof and fix the ventilators. Accordingly, we do not see how it makes any difference whether they chose to perform it by their own workmen or by means of a sub-contract. We cannot doubt that they had undertaken to perform the work, and had it not been done, or had it been done in an unsatisfactory manner, it would have been against the first defendants only, and not against their sub-contractors, that the building owners would have had a remedy. The duty is to provide suitable precautions to prevent men working on the roof from falling, and that is thrown on the person who performs the work who can, no doubt, choose how he will perform it. If, then, a duty was cast on the first defendants, who had undertaken to perform the roof work, they cannot avoid it by sub-contracting. The ordinary principle of law which, in our opinion, applies, is nowhere more clearly stated than by LORD BLACKBURN in Dalton v. Angus (1), where he said (6 App. Cas. 829):

"... a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it."

This passage was referred to by the court in Hardaker v. Idle District Council (2), in which all the cases on the subject were reviewed. It is true that in that case the duty was owed to the public, but the principle seems to us to apply whether the duty is owed to the public or only to a section of the public. It was followed in Penny v. Wimbledon Urban Council (3), and in many other cases and, we think, it applies here.

Counsel for the first defendants relied much on the breach of the regulations being a criminal offence, and said that the result of holding the first defendants liable in this case would be that they could be prosecuted and fined when the fault was that of Keating, of which they might have no knowledge, and that, while a contractor can exact an indemnity from his sub-contractor for the damages in which he may be cast in a civil action, he could get no indemnity for the fine which might be imposed. Be it so. That only means that he must take care that the necessary precautions are taken by the sub-contractor if he does not take them himself. Both he and the sub-contractor may be liable both civilly and criminally. Here, the first defendants have agreed to perform the work in question, and in the course of performing it the precautions were omitted, so, in our opinion, they are liable.

With regard to damages, the amount awarded was £8,500, of which £892 10s. represented special damages. Substantially, therefore, the judge awarded general damages of £7,600. It was, no doubt, a most serious accident, resulting in grievous injury including the loss of a leg. The plaintiff must have suffered great pain. He still suffers and will in the future, though there is good hope that he will be able to earn a reasonable wage at his former occupation as a waterproofer. The loss of his leg is the most serious item, involving as it does loss of so much of the amenities of life, and all this was in the learned judge's mind when he made his award. We need not enlarge on the difficult task that confronts a judge in these cases, and on how reluctant the Court of Appeal should be to interfere with his award. The principles on which this court acts in these matters are well known, and while we are not to disturb the finding unless what is awarded is inordinately high or excessively low, one still has no certain criterion by which to judge what is inordinate or excessive. It is, however, legitimate, in our opinion, for this court to endeavour, not to lay down some standard, for that is impossible, but to keep the awards at least to some extent in line so that they may not appear to be disproportionate for the same class of injury. The injuries in this case are, unfortunately, of a class that are all too common in motor car collisions as well as in industrial accidents, and, while no doubt damages are properly higher than they used to be, reflecting the decreased value of money, we feel obliged, even with some regret, to say that we think an award of £7,600 is a great deal higher than is usually awarded in comparable cases. We would reduce the general damages by £2,000, thus awarding the plaintiff, with his special damages, £6,492 10s.

We now have to deal with the costs of the action. The learned judge made what is commonly called a Bullock order, the effect of which is that the first defendants have to pay the costs which the plaintiff was ordered to pay to the second defendants direct to the latter. In making this order, the judge gave leave to appeal, presumably so that this court could consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, it was proper to exercise his discretion in this matter. It is to be noticed that the cause of action alleged by the plaintiff against the second defendants is entirely independent of his claim against the first defendants. As against the second defendants, his cause of action was based on the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26, alleging that those defendants had failed to provide and maintain safe means of access and failed to provide any or suitable means by fencing or otherwise to ensure the safety of the plaintiff at his place of work. That cause of action was based on the assumption that the second defendants were the occupiers of a factory and failed because the factory had not yet been completed. The cause of action against the first defendants was based entirely on a breach of the building regulations, and there it was quite immaterial whether the work was being done on a factory or any other building.

A Bullock order is appropriate where a plaintiff is in doubt as to which of two persons is responsible for the act or acts of negligence which caused his injury, the most common instance being, of course, where a third person is injured in a collision between two vehicles and where the accident is, therefore, caused by the negligence of one or the other, or both. It does not appear to us that it is an appropriate order to make where a plaintiff is alleging perfectly independent causes of action against two defendants where the breaches of duty alleged are in no way connected the one with the other. That the first defendants denied that they were responsible for the breach of reg. 31 was in effect putting the blame on Keating, but not on the second defendants, and we can see no ground on which the order should have been made, and we think, therefore, that the order that the first defendants should pay the second defendants' costs must be set aside, and the order must be that the plaintiff pay the second defendants' costs. The result is that the appeal is allowed and the order varied by reducing the damages to the sum of £6,492 10s., and the order that the first defendants pay the second defendants' costs is set aside, and the plaintiff is ordered to pay them.

Appeal allowed. Order varied by reducing damages to £6,492 10s. Order for first defendants to pay second defendants' costs of trial set aside and plaintiff ordered to pay such costs.

Re MALTBY MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT. AYLEN AND ANOTHER v. GAUD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 12, 1953.]

Settlement—After-acquired property—“Property to which the wife may become entitled in possession or reversion”—Property vested in reversion before marriage falling into possession during marriage—Property appointed to wife during marriage.

By a marriage settlement dated Apr. 14, 1937, the wife settled certain securities, her absolute property, and covenanted with the trustees “that there shall be duly vested in the trustees . . . all real and personal property exceeding in value from the same source £200 to which the wife may afterwards during the marriage become entitled in possession or reversion or have any power of beneficial disposition over except by will . . .”

HELD: property in which the wife was entitled to a vested interest in reversion at the date of the marriage was not, on its falling into possession during the marriage, caught by the covenant, but property in which, at the date of her marriage, she had an interest in default of appointment, and in which during her marriage she took an interest by virtue of the exercise in her favour of a power of appointment, was caught by the covenant.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether (i) the share of the plaintiff, Alice Brough Aylen, in a trust legacy of £10,000 bequeathed by the will of her grandfather, Brough Maltby, and (ii) the share of the said plaintiff in the funds settled on the marriage of the said plaintiff’s parents appointed to her by the will of her father ought, by reason of cl. 4 of her marriage settlement dated Apr. 14, 1937, to be assigned to the trustees of the said settlement.

By a marriage settlement dated Apr. 14, 1937, the wife, Alice Brough Aylen, settled certain securities then her own absolute property, and by cl. 4 of the settlement covenanted with the trustees “that there shall be duly vested in the trustees . . . all real and personal property exceeding in value from the same source £200 to which the wife may afterwards during the marriage become entitled in possession or reversion or have any power of beneficial disposition over except by will . . .” By his will dated Jan. 28, 1925, the wife’s grandfather, Brough Maltby, who died on Nov. 7, 1927, directed his trustees to stand possessed of a sum of £10,000 on trust to pay the income thereof to his son, Brough Maltby (the younger), the wife’s father (hereinafter called “the father”), during his life, and after his death to the wife’s mother, Isabel Armstrong Maltby (hereinafter called “the mother”), during her life, and after the death of the survivor of them in trust for all his grandchildren (including the wife) who being males should attain the age of twenty-five years or being females should attain that age or marry under that age, with a proviso that if any such grandchild should have died in the lifetime of his or her parents or either of them leaving a child or children that child or those children should take the share of the deceased parent.

A By a settlement dated Feb. 7, 1907, made on the marriage of the father and the mother, it was declared inter alia that the trustees thereof should stand possessed of both the "wife's fund" and "the husband's fund" (as therein defined) and the income thereof on trust subject to the life interests therein of the father and the mother and the survivor of them for all or any such one or more of the issue of the said marriage in such manner as the father and the mother should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment as the survivor of the father and the mother should by deed B or will or codicil appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all the children or any the child of the then intended marriage who being sons or a son should attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter should attain that age or marry if more than one in equal shares.

C The joint power of appointment given to the father and the mother by the settlement of 1907 was never exercised. On May 24, 1935, the mother died. By his will dated Mar. 18, 1949, the father, who died on Jan. 21, 1951, appointed that the trustees of the settlement of 1907 should from and after his death stand possessed of the wife's fund and the husband's fund on trust for his three children (including the wife, Alice Brough Aylen) in equal shares absolutely.

D Wigan for the plaintiffs, Alice Brough Aylen, and her husband, Ian Gerald Aylen.

J. V. Nesbitt for the first and second defendants, the trustees of the settlement of 1937.

Tonge for the infant defendants, beneficially interested in remainder under the settlement of 1937.

E HARMAN, J.: The plaintiffs in this suit are husband and wife. On the occasion of their marriage in 1937, a settlement was made whereby the wife settled certain securities, then her own absolute property. The settlement also contained words which are common form, although only one of the common forms used in that frequently dangerous clause known as an after-acquired property clause. The wife covenanted with the trustees

F "that there shall be duly vested in the trustees . . . all real and personal property exceeding in value from the same source £200 to which the wife may afterwards during the marriage become entitled in possession or reversion or have any power of beneficial disposition over except by will . . ."

G Then follow some immaterial exceptions. This clause may be read in two ways, either as catching only interests (whether in possession or reversion) in property which came to the wife during the marriage or as including also interests which were reversionary before the marriage but vest in the wife in possession during the marriage. In the absence of authority, I should incline to the narrower view. If before the marriage the wife already has a vested reversionary interest H in some property which is intended to be brought into settlement, it is natural to settle it there and then as can easily be done. It may, however, well be desired to settle benefactions to or other acquisitions by the wife occurring during the marriage but unknown or uncertain by reason of their contingent nature at the date of the settlement, and a covenant is the convenient way of effecting this.

The facts here are that at the time this settlement was made, the wife was entitled, under the will of her grandfather, who died in 1927, to a vested interest in a trust legacy of £10,000, liable to be divested if she predeceased either of her parents. Her father was then living, but her mother was dead. I should have thought, unaided by authority, that that was not property to which she "may afterwards become entitled", but was property to which she was already entitled and which could have been settled at the time. It is said, however, that I am constrained by authority to hold that it is the vesting in possession to which I must look, and that the fact that her reversion was not caught did not prevent the property being caught when it fell into possession on the death of the surviving parent, her father. A

The matter is not without authority, and I have been referred to three cases which cover the ground. KEKEWICH, J., had a similar question before him in Re Bland's Settlement (1), where the words were "shall become entitled". Those words, in my view, are the same as "shall become entitled in possession or reversion", because SIR LANCELOT SHADWELL, V.-C., in an older case, Blythe v. Granville (2), said (13 Sim. 195) that the words "become entitled" mean "become entitled either in possession or in reversion". KEKEWICH, J. ([1905] 1 Ch. 9), cites a decision of SIR JOHN WICKENS, V.-C., in Re Clinton's Trusts (3) (L.R. 13 Eq. 305). The citation is this: B

"The expression 'become entitled to' in these and most covenants of the sort applies, I conceive, only to an acquisition of interest by the wife, and this may mean an acquisition of property in which the wife had no interest at the time of marriage, and which vests in her absolutely during the coverture—or an acquisition of property which she was entitled to in remainder at the time of marriage, and which vests in possession during the coverture—or an acquisition of property in which she had no interest at the time of the marriage, which vests in her by way of future title during the coverture, but does not vest in possession till it is determined. There can be no doubt that the first of these three classes is within the covenant; the difficulty arises with regard to the other two classes. Both of them cannot be included in such a covenant, and the question is, which of them is, prima facie, to be considered as so included." C

That, I think, is a point on which, like KEKEWICH, J., I must follow SIR JOHN WICKENS, V.-C. Either the property caught must be property in which there was no vested interest at the time of the marriage, but in which a vested interest was acquired during the marriage, or it must be property which, though vested in interest before, only falls into possession during the marriage. As I say, I feel no doubt how I should decide the question. KEKEWICH, J., in Re Bland's Settlement (1), came to the conclusion that the property in which the wife had a vested interest in reversion when she married was not property which was caught by the settlement. D

The judgment of EVE, J., in Re Williams' Settlement (4), is to a similar effect, as I understand it. The lady in question had a contingent interest when she married, the fund falling in on the death of her brother under twenty-one, and, that being so, when it vested in her, as it did on his death, that was a share which was caught by the covenant. It seems, however, although it is not very clear, that if that had been a vested interest before marriage, merely liable to be divested by the brother's surviving over a certain date, the result would have been different. The other view is taken by LAWRENCE, J., in Re Crook's Settlement. Re Glasier's Settlement (5). There he held ([1923] 2 Ch. 339) that, notwithstanding that at the date of her marriage the wife was entitled to the property in reversion, yet, as she became entitled thereto in possession during the coverture, the property was, within the meaning of the covenant, property to which during the coverture she might become entitled in possession, and was therefore caught. The learned judge took the wider view by looking only at the words "entitled in possession" and saying that the vested interest, when it falls into possession, is exactly within the terms of the covenant, but E if the words be looked at the other way, "entitled to the property" will not apply except to an interest coming into existence after the date of the coverture, whether it be a title in possession or in reversion. On the latter view previously vested interests in reversion are not caught. LAWRENCE, J., after hearing all the arguments, said that the cases were not easy to reconcile, and he felt himself free to follow his own view. If he was free then, so, I think, am I, and the view I follow is that, having been a vested interest before coverture, this interest was not caught by the after-acquired property clause.

A further question is raised by reason of the fact that the wife, at the time of her marriage, had another interest. That was an interest in a fund in default of appointment, but, in the event, that interest has never fructified. She has inherited a share in the fund by virtue of an appointment made after the marriage under the same settlement. It seems to me that that is an interest which has been created in her since the marriage, and, therefore, it is plainly caught by the after-acquired property clause.

Order accordingly.

GETREIDE-IMPORT-GESELLSCHAFT m.b.H. v. CONTIMAR S.A. COMPANIA INDUSTRIAL COMERCIAL Y-MARITIMA.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), May 6, 7, 8, 1953.]

Arbitration—Ouster of jurisdiction of court—Term of contract that award condition precedent to proceedings—Dispute as to right of appeal against award—Action to enforce award—Competency—Service of notice of appeal—London Corn Trade Association contract.

A contract for the sale of goods incorporated the terms of a London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., standard form of contract, which required all the disputes arising out of the contract to be referred to arbitration, prohibited the bringing of any action in respect of any such dispute until it had been settled by arbitrators, or, on appeal, by the committee of appeal, and made the obtaining of an award "a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract". Notice of appeal against an award was required to be given to the secretary of the association and to the other party to the dispute within fourteen consecutive days from the date of the award. By cl. (D) of the contract notices were required "to be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left". Clause (A), under which for the purpose of proceedings the making and performance of the contract were deemed to be in England (except as to the enforcement of an award), provided that any party "residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd."

On Aug. 11, 1952, the sellers, against whom an award on an arbitration under the contract had been made on July 30, 1952, sent notice claiming an appeal against the award to the secretary of the association, who notified the buyers at their head office at Duisburg, Germany, by a letter which was received by the buyers on Aug. 13. On Aug. 12 the sellers posted notice that the appeal had been claimed to the buyers at their branch office at Frankfurt-am-Main, but in error addressed it to "Friedrich-Ebert-Strasse 27, Frankfurt A.M." instead of to "Niedenu 59, Frankfurt A.M." This notice was not received until after Aug. 13. In an action by the buyers for a declaration that the award was valid and final and conclusive and that the sellers had no right of appeal, Held: (i) the sellers' notice of appeal was invalid because (a) being wrongly addressed, it did not comply with the requirements of cl. (D) as to serving notice of appeal, and the words providing that the notice was to be deemed to have been received within twenty-four hours was designed to validate only a notice that was correctly addressed; (b) in sending notification of the appeal to the buyers, the secretary of the association was not acting as agent for the sellers.

(ii) the question of the validity of the notice of appeal was a dispute arising, not out of the contract, but out of the award and, being a question which went to the jurisdiction, was not within the sphere of the arbitrators' jurisdiction, and, therefore, the obtaining of an award on the issue of the sellers' right of appeal was not a condition precedent to the bringing of the action, and the court was not precluded from granting a declaration that there was no right of appeal.

APPEAL by the defendants (the sellers) from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Dec. 12, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 257.

The plaintiffs carried on business at Duisburg, Germany, with a branch at Frankfurt-am-Main, and the defendants carried on business at Buenos Aires. On Nov. 17, 1950, through the agency of one Franz Hagen, in Hamburg, acting for the two parties, the plaintiffs, as buyers, and the defendants, as sellers, entered into a contract for the sale of a quantity of River Plate wheat. The contract was made subject to the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., contract No. 41, rye terms, London arbitration, which contained the following terms:

(A) "Buyer and seller agree that, for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have been made in England, and to be performed there, any correspondence in reference to the offer, the acceptance, the place of payment or otherwise notwithstanding, and the courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes which may arise under this contract. Such disputes shall be settled according to the law of England whatever the domicile, residence, or place of business of the parties to this contract may be or become. Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., and if in Scotland, he shall be held to have prorogated jurisdiction against himself to the English courts, or if in Northern Ireland to have submitted to the jurisdiction, and to be bound by the decision of the English courts."

A " (B) All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract, including any question of law appearing in the proceedings, whether arising between the parties hereto, or between one of the parties hereto and the trustee in bankruptcy of the other party, shall be referred to arbitration, according to the arbitration rule indorsed hereon, and this stipulation may be a rule of any of the Divisions of His Majesty's High Court of Justice in Northern Ireland, on the application of either contracting party, for the purpose of enforcing an award against a party residing or carrying on business in Northern Ireland. Neither buyer, seller, trustee in bankruptcy, nor any other person claiming under either of them, shall bring any action against the other of them in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by arbitrators, or by the committee of appeal, as the case may be, and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining an award from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract . . . The arbitration to be held in London."

C " (C) In case any party to an award shall be dissatisfied with the award a right of appeal shall lie to the committee of appeal elected for that purpose in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., in force at the date of the contract, provided the following conditions are complied with:—(a) The costs of the award intended to be appealed from have been paid by one of the parties thereto, (b) Notice claiming appeal is given to the secretary of the association within fourteen consecutive days from the date of the award . . . (c) Within the said fourteen consecutive days, notice that the appeal has been claimed is given by the appellant direct to his seller or buyer, as the case may be."

E " (D) Notices under this rule to be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left."

F A claim made by the buyers against the sellers in respect of the performance of the contract was submitted to arbitration. The arbitrators disagreed and appointed an umpire, and on July 30, 1952, the umpire made his award, finding the sellers in default under the contract and granting the buyers a substantial sum by way of damages. On Aug. 11, in pursuance of their right of appeal under the contract, the sellers, through their agents, Joseph Pyke & Sons (Liverpool), Ltd., notified the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., by letter that they claimed an appeal against the award and enclosed the appropriate amount for the fees of the award. On Aug. 12 the secretary of the association sent a letter to the buyers at Duisburg notifying them and giving them particulars of the appeal. The buyers received that letter on Aug. 13. On Aug. 12 the sellers sent from Buenos Aires to the buyers at Frankfurt-am-Main a letter notifying them that on Aug. 11 they (the sellers) had given notice of appeal against the award to the association. Owing to confusion of the name of the buyers with that of another company, the letter was addressed to the buyers at "Friedrich-Ebert-Strasse 27, Frankfurt A.M." instead of "Niedenuau 59, Frankfurt A.M.", and in consequence, it did not reach them at their Frankfurt or Duisburg office until after the time had expired for giving notice of appeal under the contract.

H The buyers claimed a declaration that the award was valid and final and conclusive as between the parties, that the sellers had no right to prosecute an appeal from the award, and that the appeal committee had no power to hear or entertain any such appeal or to vary or reverse the award. SELLERS, J., held that the sellers had failed to comply with a condition as to serving notice of appeal and were not entitled to prosecute the appeal, and he granted the declaration asked for. The sellers appealed.

Eustace Roskill, Q.C., and Bateson for the sellers.

T. G. Roche for the buyers.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The fourteen days stipulated by cl. (C) (c) expired at midnight on Aug. 13-14, so that the letter of Aug. 12, which was wrongly addressed, would have been in time and a good notice within cl. (C) (c) had it been correctly addressed. Counsel for the sellers submits that it ought to be so regarded. He says it was sent direct to the buyers. It was sent by post, and he submitted that it was sent to the place where the company to whom it was addressed carried on business by reason of the fact that "Frankfurt" appeared on the envelope and on the letter. The question which arises is: Can it be said that that document was sent by post to the place where the buyers were carrying on business? It seems to me the answer to that problem must be "No". It was sent—and it was addressed—to a place in Frankfurt at which another company altogether carried on business. SELLERS, J., in considering this point, was inclined to think that, if the letter had been addressed to "Frankfurt" merely, without stating any address, it would have been sufficient compliance with the rule. That may be so. The learned judge did not express any final opinion on that. A number of circumstances would have to be considered: (a) the size of the buyers' business at Frankfurt, and (b) the size of Frankfurt. In many cases it might be quite sufficient to send a letter to a well-known business house addressed to the town in which it carried on business, but it would not be so in every case. This letter was addressed to the wrong address, and, although I regret to have to say it, the point raised by counsel that it was a good notice of appeal under the rule fails.

It is submitted that if that letter dated Aug. 12, was not a good notice, it is still open to the sellers to say that the letter of Aug. 11 addressed by the secretary of the association to the buyers was a good notice. The letter of Aug. 11 from the secretary of the association informs the buyers that the secretary had received from the sellers notice of appeal, and it is said that that is a sufficient communication for all practical purposes, for the buyers knew as from Aug. 12 that there was to be an appeal. The submission made by counsel is that that letter was written by the secretary of the association as agent for the sellers, and that, therefore, it is a good notice under the rule. In my view, the secretary of the association was not the agent of the sellers. He was not purporting to act as such, nor did anyone ever consider that he was acting in that capacity. I cannot see that the sellers can be heard to say that for the purpose of giving notice under the contract the secretary of the association must be treated as their agent. The passing on of the information was an act of courtesy on the part of the association and of its secretary, and that point fails.

There arises on this part of the case another point of some interest. Clause (A) provides, inter alia:

"Any party to this contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., and if in Scotland, he shall be held to have prorogated jurisdiction against himself to the English courts, or if in Northern Ireland to have submitted to the jurisdiction, and to be bound by the decision of the English courts."

The buyers are a German company residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in England or Wales, so, by that clause, they are to be considered, for the purposes of proceedings at law or in arbitration, as ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd. Clause (D) provides:

A "Notices under this rule to be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left."

B Counsel on behalf of the buyers submitted that, as the buyers were a company carrying on business elsewhere than in England, they must be considered as carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade Association, and, therefore, they fell within the words of cl. (D) "by reason of the provisions of the contract", and the only place at which service could be made on them was the office of the association. That was considered by SELLERS, J., who reached the view that under the provisions I have read there was an alternative
C so that service could be either at the place at which the foreign company was in fact carrying on business or at the office of the London Corn Trade Association. I am bound to say I consider that to be the sensible way of looking at the matter. I am not wholly satisfied that it is the right way, but I do not think it is necessary for the court to resolve that question.

D Counsel for the sellers raised a further point which is more complicated than those with which I have dealt so far. It was under the provisions of cl. (A) and cl. (B) that the dispute arising out of the contract was referred to arbitration and the umpire made an award in favour of the buyers. The sellers desired to appeal against that award. When the question as to their notice or notices arose, the buyers issued the writ in this action to enforce the award. The submission of counsel for the sellers is that the dispute was a dispute arising
E under and out of the contract, and, therefore, must be referred to arbitration. He submitted that this action must fail by reason of the words that an award "shall be a condition precedent to the right of either party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract." On the other hand, it is submitted that the question whether there was a good notice of appeal is not a question arising out of the contract, but is a question arising out of the F award. It might be said that that point should have been raised at an earlier stage by an application to stay this action. It would then have been the duty of the court to consider whether or not the dispute which has arisen was a dispute arising out of the contract, for before the action could have been stayed it would have been necessary to show that the dispute was one which the parties had agreed should be referred to arbitration. Indeed, that is the point which
G arises now. The answer put forward by counsel on behalf of the buyers is that it is not a matter for arbitration at all, but is a matter which goes to jurisdiction. At first SELLERS, J., thought that the point made by counsel for the sellers was that the appeal tribunal should consider this question of jurisdiction. His judgment deals with that submission, and he pointed out that the appeal tribunal could not give itself jurisdiction, but that that question was one for H the court. Counsel made it clear that what he was saying was that the dispute as to the notice was a dispute to be referred to arbitration by a fresh notice, and that new arbitrators should be appointed. Those arbitrators would probably not agree, another umpire would be appointed, and, perhaps, there would be another notice of appeal. In the meantime the first appeal would be awaiting the determination of that question. So that on the final submission of counsel for the sellers on this part of the case—the question of law whether or not either of the notices was good—would have to be decided by arbitration first, an appeal would lie to the appeal tribunal, and then there might be an application for a Case to be stated, and the issue might come to this court indirectly. In my view, that reduces the whole thing to absurdity and I feel that the court ought to avoid coming to such a conclusion unless by the terms of the contract we are forced to do so.

I think a useful passage is to be found in A.-G. for Manitoba v. Kelly (1), where LORD PARMOOR said ([1922] 1 A.C. 276):

"It would be impossible to allow an umpire to arrogate to himself jurisdiction over a question which, on the true construction of the submission, was not referred to him. An umpire cannot widen the area of his jurisdiction by holding, contrary to the fact, that the matter which he affects to decide is within the submission of the parties. In the present instance there has been a difference of opinion as to the extent of the jurisdiction which has been conferred by the submission upon the umpire. The majority of the Court of Appeal have adopted a narrower construction than CURRAN, J., and CAMERON, J.A."

Apart from that, it seems to me that when one looks at the words of the document this dispute on the question of notice of appeal is not, and ought not to be regarded as, a dispute arising out of the contract. I think it should be regarded as being a dispute which goes to jurisdiction, for it is a dispute arising on the award and not out of the contract. For those reasons I feel that that point fails. In the result, the buyers are entitled to say that on the contract between the parties the umpire's award is final and conclusive, for I do not think it would be right to order that another arbitration should determine whether this award is final and conclusive. I agree with the judgment of SELLERS, J., and think that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. It seems plain that the buyers in fact received notice of the sellers' intended appeal within the stipulated period of fourteen consecutive days from July 30, 1952, the date of the award. That being so, I would gladly have held, had I felt it open to us to do so, that, whatever deficiencies there may have been in the notice given to the buyers in point of form, nevertheless the appeal should be considered competent, because the real substance and intention of the provisions as to notice had been carried out. To my regret, I find it impossible to regard that attractive method of dealing with the matter as open to the court. The parties have chosen to contract by reference to the London Corn Trade Association, Ltd., contract No. 41. That form includes an arbitration clause and provides that "the award in writing, on an official form, of the two arbitrators or their umpire (subject only to the right of appeal hereinafter mentioned) shall be conclusive and binding."

It then proceeds to give a right of appeal on certain conditions, and the award is final and binding subject only to a right of appeal the existence of which is made to depend on the fulfilment of the conditions stated. In those circumstances it seems to me that the conditions must be strictly complied with in order to secure the right of appeal. Counsel for the sellers, notwithstanding the many difficulties in his way, has sought to show that, by one road or another, cl. (C) (c) has been sufficiently complied with. He relies, first of all, on the letter of Aug. 12 addressed to the buyers at Frankfurt, but with a wrong street and number, and he says that this was a good service of the notice on the buyers. I cannot accept that argument. It seems to me that the requirement as to notices in cl. (D) plainly demands a notice properly addressed to the party concerned at what is in fact his place of business. This letter of Aug. 12, 1952, did not comply with that requirement. It was addressed to the address of an entirely different company, and in the result it did not reach the buyers until after the period of fourteen consecutive days had run out. It seems to me impossible in those circumstances to hold that to have been a good notice. Nor, to my mind, is it necessary to consider what degree of particularity in an address is sufficient for this purpose. Each case must depend on its own particular facts, and, as the learned judge was inclined to think, and, as my Lord has said, might be possible in some cases, it may be that, if the party to be given notice was sufficiently well known in, for example, Frankfurt, a letter addressed to that party simply at Frankfurt, without further particularity, might on the facts be a sufficient description or designation of his business address to enable him to be found by the notice in the ordinary course of post. But instances of that sort must depend on the evidence in each particular case. There would have to be evidence to the effect that the party concerned was so well known in the town in question, that, barring accidents, he would certainly be found in the ordinary course of post merely by addressing to the town.

There is no evidence of that sort in the present case, and, if there were, it would carry the sellers no further, for in this case it was not a question of an address which might or might not be sufficient. It was a question of an address which was manifestly wrong.

I cannot accept the further argument of counsel based on the provision to the effect that notices sent by post to, or left at, the place where the person, firm or company to whom they are addressed is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to be considered as carrying on business,

“shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent or left.”

If a letter is addressed to the wrong address when put in the post, in my view, it is impossible for the sender to contend that he has complied with the provisions as to notice because one of those provisions says that a notice sent by post shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same is posted. Provisions of that kind are not uncommon, and it is quite plain, to my mind, that they are designed to cover miscarriage in the post or delay in delivery of a letter properly addressed. They are not intended to make good deficiencies in the address. Accordingly, I agree with my Lord that the letter of Aug. 12, 1952, cannot be relied on as a sufficient compliance with cl. (C) (c).

Nor, in my view, can the letter sent by the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association be so regarded. As my Lord has pointed out, the secretary was not the agent of the sellers to send a notice to the buyers, and he did not purport to send the notice as their agent. It was sent by him of his own motion as an independent measure which he took in his capacity as secretary of the London Corn Trade Association. It is, no doubt, true that this notice did have the result of bringing to the knowledge of the buyers at Duisburg the fact that the sellers intended to appeal, but, in the face of the two distinct conditions of cl. (C) about notices, that is to say, (b) requiring notice of appeal to be given to the secretary of the association within fourteen consecutive days from the date of the award, and (c), requiring notice to be given by the appellant direct to his seller or buyer within the same period, I cannot hold that a notice indirectly given by the secretary, after receipt by the secretary of notice of appeal under condition (b), can be regarded as satisfying the separate requirements of condition (c) which in terms demands a notice sent by the appellant direct to his seller or buyer. Accordingly, in my opinion, on the true construction of these conditions and in the events which have happened, the conditions have not been fulfilled within the prescribed period of fourteen consecutive days, with the result that, the possibility of appeal having gone, the award has become conclusive and binding on all parties without qualification.

Counsel for the sellers also made a submission by way of objection to the jurisdiction on the strength of this provision in the arbitration clause [cl. (B)] on the face of the document:

"Neither buyer, seller, trustee in bankruptcy, nor any other person claiming under either of them, shall bring any action against the other of them in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by arbitrators, or by the committee of appeal, as the case may be, and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining an award from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract . . ."

As to this submission I would say that I have grave doubt whether it ought to be entertained at all by this court, having regard to the course the argument has taken before us and in the court below. Counsel says that in a case of this sort, where there is what is known as a Scott v. Avery clause (2), the party relying on the submission by way of objection to the jurisdiction is entitled to take his objection at the hearing as a submission in bar and is not obliged to move, before taking any other step in the proceedings, under what is now s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1950. That may be so. Nevertheless, there is a time at which the submission in bar should be made, and, in my view, the submission should be made before the party making it engages on argument designed to obtain a decision of the court in his favour on the very point which he says the court has no jurisdiction to determine. The course the matter took here and before the learned judge was that counsel argued the point and he submitted and invited the court to hold that the right of appeal was still open because the conditions had been duly complied with. And then he said (in effect):—"If I am wrong in that, I say that there is no jurisdiction, because this very matter that I have been arguing before the court is not one for the court to entertain at all: it should be referred to a further arbitration." If there is to be a submission by way of objection to the jurisdiction, that method of taking it is fraught with the gravest inconvenience, for observe the result. The learned judge, having heard all the arguments, held that the right of appeal was not open because the conditions had not been complied with. This court, again after full argument, comes to the same conclusion and confirms his decision. In the face of these concurrent decisions of both courts, what useful purpose would be served by sending the matter back to arbitration for the arbitrators to decide whether the conditions have been fulfilled? The arbitrators at first instance and the arbitrators on appeal would be constrained to hold that the conditions had not been fulfilled, because they would be faced by a decision of the Court of Appeal to that effect. Moreover, the court on any Case Stated would be bound so to hold at first instance and higher until ultimately the dispute reached the House of Lords. To allow this objection at this stage in the proceedings would be a matter of great inconvenience to the buyers and embarrassment to the arbitrators, and would cause much unnecessary delay and expense. For my part, I would, on these grounds alone, be most reluctant to allow it.

As to the merits of the objection, the question whether the conditions precedent to the right of appeal have been fulfilled is not a dispute under or arising out of the contract within the meaning of the arbitration clause. In my view, the provisions imposing these conditions are provisions stating the conditions on which alone the parties are prepared to submit a matter already the subject of an award to further arbitration by way of appeal, and it is clear that the question whether conditions such as those which form the foundation of the arbitrators' jurisdiction have been fulfilled cannot itself be a question within the scope of the arbitrators' authority, for it is only if the conditions are in fact fulfilled that the arbitrators have any jurisdiction at all. I think that view of the matter is supported by the passage in the speech of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Produce Brokers Co., Ltd. v. Olympia Oil & Cake Co., Ltd. (3) ([1916] 1 A.C. 327), and also in the passage to which my Lord has already referred in A.-G. for Manitoba v. Kelly (1). Indeed, I think counsel for the sellers conceded that he could not maintain that the appeal committee would have jurisdiction to determine whether the conditions had been fulfilled or not, but he said that this was, nevertheless, a dispute under the contract—within the original submission, if I may so describe it, to the arbitrators at first instance, and that, inasmuch as the matter went, not to their own jurisdiction, but to the jurisdiction of the appeal committee, those arbitrators could take it into consideration. In my opinion, that way of putting the case must also fail. The arbitrators at first instance have made an award. Unless the conditions giving the dissatisfied party a right of appeal have been fulfilled, that award is final and binding. If the award be final and binding because the conditions on which the right of appeal depends have not been fulfilled, it seems to me plain that no arbitrators at first instance can have any locus standi in the matter or any jurisdiction to say that an award which has become final and binding is still open to appeal. Nor does it seem to me possible to hold that arbitrators at first instance would have jurisdiction to make an appeal competent by holding that the conditions had been fulfilled when in fact they had not. To put the matter in another way, these provisions for arbitration, as I view them, have two stages. There is a stage at first instance and there is an appeal stage. The arbitrators at first instance to whom the dispute is referred decide the dispute and make their award. They then, as it seems to me, are functi officio so far as that award is concerned, and any question arising thereafter as to the competence of any appeal from that award is outside their sphere of jurisdiction. The question whether the dissatisfied party has complied with the conditions entitling him to appeal arises at the second, or appellate, stage of arbitration. The provisions as to appeal are in the nature of a further or supplementary submission, and the parties have agreed to it on certain conditions, those conditions being the ones to which I have referred in regard to notices and so on. It was agreed by the parties that, if those conditions were fulfilled, but not otherwise, there was to be a further reference to arbitration by way of appeal from the original arbitration. That submission was only made on condition that the requirements I have mentioned should have been fulfilled. The question whether the conditions have been fulfilled is a matter wholly outside the scope of either submission, that is to say, wholly outside the scope of the submission to the arbitration at first instance and wholly outside the scope of the submission to arbitration by way of appeal. I agree that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in agreement with the judgments which have been delivered by my Lords. I add a few words because of the importance of the case to the parties. They are foreign companies and have agreed that their disputes should be subject to the arbitrament of the British courts. I regret the result at which we feel compelled to arrive. But the parties have contracted in the terms of the contract which is before us and it is our duty to give effect to what is, in our view, the proper construction of the terms of the contract.

In regard to the first part of the argument of counsel for the sellers, it does not seem to me that the letter of Aug. 12 meets the requirements of the words of cl. (D):

“Notices . . . to be given in writing, and sent by post to . . . the place where the . . . company to whom they are addressed is carrying on . . . business . . .”

The buyers were not carrying on business at the place to which the letter was addressed. Nor, in my judgment, do the concluding words:—“and shall be deemed to have been received not later than twenty-four hours after the same are so sent . . .”—avail the sellers. Those words have reference to notices complying with the terms of the early part of the clause, and the word “so” gives point to this view. In spite of counsel's valiant effort, I do not feel that he succeeds either on his first and main contention, or on his contention based on the letter written by the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association. I cannot regard that letter as having been written by the secretary as agent for the sellers. The letter does not purport to have been written by the secretary as an agent of or on behalf of the sellers, and, furthermore, there was nothing that I can find by way of ratification.

The further point taken by counsel is that he has a complete answer to the action because of the provisions of the contract which includes a Scott v. Avery clause (2). The position was that there was an award, and, after the notices to which consideration has been given, were sent, a date was fixed for the hearing of the appeal, namely, Oct. 14. The buyers wrote and asked if that date would be vacated, but the sellers were unwilling to agree. The result was that this action was commenced by writ dated Sept. 22. After the issue of the writ the appeal committee agreed that, pending the decision of the court, no hearing of the appeal would take place. I find myself in full agreement with the observations which JENKINS, L.J., has made as to the curious position which now arises. If counsel were right on this point, this action would fail. There would then have to be an arbitration to determine matters which were argued fully before SELLERS, J., on which he gave his decision, and which have now been fully argued on appeal in this court and on which all the members of this court have given their opinions concurring with those reached by SELLERS, J. The result would be strange indeed, for there would have to be an arbitration, the result of which would be a foregone conclusion, for the arbitrators and umpire would be obliged to follow the decisions given by the courts. I do not find myself able to agree with counsel's argument.

The important words in this connection are these of cl. B:

"All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract, including any question of law appearing in the proceedings . . . shall be referred to arbitration . . . Neither buyer, seller, trustee in bankruptcy, nor any other person claiming under either of them, shall bring any action against the other of them in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by arbitrators, or by the committee of appeal, as the case may be . . ."

I think there the words "such dispute" must refer to the words which have gone earlier "disputes from time to time arising out of the contract". Then the words continue:

"and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining an award from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract . . ."

Thus, the question arises, whether the buyers are suing in respect of a claim arising out of the contract. In my judgment, they are not. They did have a claim arising out of a contract, and an award was made in their favour. Now, the sellers seek to upset that award by an appeal without complying with the conditions for an appeal. In my judgment, the matters now raised are not matters properly to be described as a claim arising out of the contract, nor as a dispute arising out of the contract. The dispute would never have arisen but for the contract, but the real dispute between the parties was determined and an award was made. The present dispute is once removed from the contract, for it is a dispute in respect of facts arising subsequent to the award. It is true that the contract must be looked at because it is necessary to see what were the provisions as to appeal, but the buyers are taking steps to prevent an appeal which is not in order. They are preserving or defending an award which they have and which was made in respect of a dispute arising out of the contract.

In so doing they are not suing in respect of a claim arising out of the contract. They are taking steps to repel an unauthorised attack on their award. I consider that this appeal must fail.

Appeal dismissed.

BADDELEY AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

B [COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), March 24, 25, 26, May 18, 1953.]

Charity—Benefit to community—Religious, moral, social and physical well-being—Sufficient section of public—Uncertainty—Members or likely to become members of Methodist Church in two boroughs—Persons benefiting depending on opinion of mission leaders—Poverty—Insufficiency of means—Advancement of education—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 54 (1).

C Stamp Duty—Charity—Moral, social and physical well-being—Whether object charitable—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 54 (1).

Land on which stood a mission church, lecture room and store, was conveyed to trustees on trust to permit the land to be appropriated and used by the leaders of a mission "for the promotion of the religious social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton . . . by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction and for the social and physical training and recreation of such aforementioned persons who for the time being are in the opinion of such leaders members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents and . . . by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons". Other land, which was laid out as a playing field, and on which a pavilion and groundsman's bungalow had been erected, was conveyed to the same trustees on similar trusts except that "moral well-being" was substituted for "religious well-being" throughout and the residents benefiting were required, in the opinion of the mission leaders, to be, or to be likely to become, members of the Methodist Church.

F HELD: (i) the sole object of each trust was the promotion of the religious (in the second case moral), social, and physical well-being of the residents, the remainder of the trusts being concerned with means to attain those ends and not being ends in themselves and the object being a single one with three aspects and not three objects.

G (ii) promotion of well-being denoted improvement and social and physical well-being meant in both cases, not mere social enjoyment or skill or fitness for sport, but the attainment of the standards of secular conduct and behaviour of a good neighbour and a good citizen and improvement of general bodily health, and moral well-being included religious improvement and the inculcation of a desirable code of secular ethics, these interpretations being reinforced by the inclusion of training as a means of attaining these objects and by the limitation of benefit to persons of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the benefits provided.

H (iii) the trusts were not established for the relief of poverty, insufficiency of means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided under the two conveyances not amounting to poverty for this purpose, although giving the trusts an affinity to charities for the relief of poverty; and they were not established for the advancement of education or, exclusively, of religion.

(iv) charitable purposes beneficial to the community not falling under the heads of relief of poverty and advancement of education and religion included purposes analogous to purposes falling under those heads, and, therefore, religious, moral, physical and social well-being as interpreted were charitable purposes.

(v) persons resident in the two county boroughs who in the opinion of the mission leaders were or were likely to become members of the Methodist Church, notwithstanding that power of selection were a sufficient section of the public for the purpose of establishing a charitable trust and the religious qualification did not render the trust void for uncertainty (especially as the admission to participation was made dependent on the opinion of the leaders).

(vi) given the requisite element of public benefit, the question in any given case was whether the trust claimed to be charitable was within the spirit and intendment of the statute of Elizabeth I, and that question was to be answered by reference to the preamble as a whole, and in the light of the decided cases; the trusts were charitable trusts and the stamp duty on the conveyances must be determined accordingly.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: In view of the comments made in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 521), it would seem that the line of cases typified by Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (1882) (7 App. Cas. 633) should not now be regarded as authoritative save in so far as they can be explained on the ground that the particular purpose was regarded as falling within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I (43 Eliz. 1, c. 4).

APPEALS from orders of HARMAN, J., dated Dec. 18, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 63, dismissing appeals by Cases Stated under the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 13, from decisions of the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

H The appellants, who were the trustees of the Newtown Trust, presented two instruments to the Inland Revenue Commissioners for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which they were chargeable. The two instruments were both dated Aug. 21, 1951, and were: (1) A conveyance between the British Transport Commission, Mr. Bernard Baddeley, and the trustees, whereby, in consideration of the payment of £1,000 by Mr. Baddeley to the commission, the commission granted and conveyed and Mr. Baddeley conveyed and confirmed to the trustees the fee simple in certain land and buildings at Stratford, Essex, on, inter alia, the following trusts: for the promotion of the religious, social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in the county of Essex by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction and the social and physical training and recreation of such persons who, for the time being, were in the opinion of the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trusts. (2) A conveyance of the fee simple of land at Ilford, Essex, laid out as a playing field, on part of which a pavilion and a groundsman's bungalow had been erected, accompanied by a payment of £10,000 to be held as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1925, by Mr. Bernard Baddeley to the trustees, on, inter alia, the following trusts: for the promotion of the moral, social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in the county of Essex by the provision of facilities for moral, social and physical training and recreation of such persons who, for the time being, were in the opinion of the leaders of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trust. The commissioners were of opinion that the conveyances were liable to ad valorem duty at the rate of £1 for every £50 of the £1,000 in the first case, and of the £5,650 at which they assessed the value of the property in the second case. The trustees contended that the conveyances were made to a body of persons established for charitable purposes or to the trustees of a trust so established within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1947, s. 54 (1), and that the duty should be at the rate of 10s. for every £50 of the amount and value. HARMAN, J., held that the purposes of the trusts were not exclusively charitable. The trustees appealed.

S. Pascoe Hayward, Q.C., and W. F. Waite for the trustees.

Cross, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.) and Denys B. Buckley as amici curiae.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 18. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: I have had the pleasure and advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by JENKINS, L.J., who, after a close analysis of the language of the two relevant conveyances of Aug. 21, 1951 (which in this as in every case it is first of all necessary to construe), and after reference to the numerous authorities to which our attention was directed, has reached the conclusion that the two deeds ought to be regarded as

"made to a body of persons established for charitable purposes only or to the trustees of a trust so established" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1947, s. 54 (1). I find myself in entire agreement with JENKINS, L.J., and with the reasons for his judgment, and, were it not for the importance of the arguments to which the case has given rise and to the fact that we are differing from HARMAN, J., in the court below, I should have been content to do no more than express my concurrence with JENKINS, L.J. In the circumstances, however, I hope that it may be useful for me, without repeating his reasoning, to add some few considerations of my own.

On the question of construction of the deeds, I agree with JENKINS, L.J., that the overriding purpose of the trusts therein respectively contained are the promotion of the religious, social and physical well-being (in the one case) and of the moral, social and physical well-being (in the other) of the class of persons therein identified, and that the other relevant provisions of the two deeds serve only to indicate the means ancillary to those objects. In this respect, therefore, the present case is, in my judgment, essentially distinct from Londonderry

Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In the deed which was in that case under consideration, the main object of the disposition was that it should be used “ as a hall for meetings or for social or recreation purposes in connection with the various Presbyterian churches in . . . Londonderry . . . or as a hostel or boarding house or as a library or for such other . . . purposes as the board of governors . . . shall . . . think fit, it being the true intention . . . that the said premises shall be used for . . . assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian church in . . . Londonderry . . . in such manner as the said board of governors . . . shall . . . think right.”

A The language I have quoted (and in quoting it I have emphasised the repeated use of the disjunctive “ or ”) contemplates on the face of it the use of the property conveyed exclusively for “ social purposes ”, “ recreation purposes ”, or, e.g., for a boarding house, objects which, according to the authorities, would be outside the scope of exclusively charitable trusts unless the final words in the quotation could be so construed as to confine, and, as it were, rescue, what had gone before. The Irish Court of Appeal held that the final words could not have that effect. In the present case, JENKINS, L.J.’s analysis of very different language shows that no such rescue operation is here demanded, and that the vital general words appear, not by way of an expository limitation, but as the opening and primary expression of the objects of the trusts. Although the Londonderry case (1) is not binding on this court, I agree with HARMAN, J., that it must be treated with the greatest respect, and not the least so because, the law in regard to charities being the same in Northern Ireland as in England, it is plainly desirable that the decisions of the courts in the two countries should be in conformity. It is, however, unnecessary for me to say more about the Londonderry case (1) since, for the reasons I have indicated, it cannot, in my judgment, be said to cover the present case, or provide the clue for its decision.

E The most important and the most difficult question raised in the present appeal is whether, assuming that the class of persons to be benefited can properly be said to be a section of the public, the second essential requirement for satisfying the test of a trust claiming to be charitable is satisfied, i.e., whether the purposes of the deed fall within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I (43 Eliz. 1, c. 4). I take as my guide the language of LORD SIMONDS in Williams’ Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 518):

G “ My Lords, there are, I think, two propositions which must ever be borne in mind in any case in which the question is whether a trust is charitable. The first is that it is still the general law that a trust is not charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz. c. 4, which is expressly preserved by s. 13 (2) of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. The second is that the classification of charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Pemsel’s case (3) ([1891] A.C. 583) must always be read subject to the qualification appearing in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Macduff (4) ([1896] 2 Ch. 466): ‘ Now SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY did not mean, and I am certain that LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean, to say that every object of public general utility must necessarily be a charity. Some may be and some may not be ’. This observation has been expanded by VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in this House in A.-G. v. National Provincial Bank (5) ([1924] A.C. 265), in these words: ‘ LORD MACNAGHTEN did not mean that all trusts beneficial to the community are charitable, but that there were certain beneficial trusts which fall within that category: and accordingly to argue that because a trust is for a purpose beneficial to the community it is therefore a charitable trust is to turn round his sentence and to give it a different meaning. So here it is not enough to say that the trust in question is for public purposes beneficial to the community or is for the public welfare; you must also show it to be a charitable trust."

I agree with JENKINS, L.J., that the trusts in the present case cannot be regarded as being for the advancement of religion, though, at any rate in one instance, they have a religious element in them. I agree also with him that they cannot be regarded as for relief of poverty, though the "means test" which they comprehend endows them with a certain flavour of poor relief, and I accept the argument that to show that the trusts are trusts for the advancement of religion or for the relief of poverty or both, but comprehend also other objects, will not (at least if the latter are not merely incidental in character) qualify the whole for the enjoyment of the privileges of a charity unless those other objects are also themselves charitable.

In the course of his judgment HARMAN, J., was impressed by the emphasis which he discerned on recreation as an essential purpose of the trusts, and he indicated his view (though I do not think it was essential to his conclusion) that trusts for promoting or providing recreation are not charitable. Thus, he said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 67):

"If I were free to do so, I should hold that recreation is not a charitable object . . ."

and he thus concluded his judgment (ibid., 69):

"Accordingly, if I had held that recreation was a charitable object, I should have held that the purpose here was public recreation."

These expressions of opinion by the learned judge have served to afford to us at the hearing in this court the benefit of the argument of the Attorney-General, who appeared before us as amicus curiae, being anxious lest the learned judge's expressions might be regarded as casting doubt on the qualification as charitable trusts of many activities like those, for example, of the National Playing Fields Association. With all respect to him, I think that the opinion of HARMAN, J., on trusts for recreation was too broadly stated. It is not now in doubt that trusts which may be described as being for "the encouragement of mere sport" (which may be the same thing as "the mere encouragement of sport") would not be charitable: Re Nottage (6). On the other hand, apart from the inference which must be drawn from the many statutes to which we were referred by the Attorney-General, beginning with the Recreation Grounds Act, 1859, it is, in my judgment, clear that trusts for the provision or promotion of recreation, even though comprehending organised games, may well qualify as charitable trusts if, for example, they can in their context be regarded as educative in their main purpose. And in the most recent case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. City of Glasgow Police Athletic Asscn. (7), it was clearly indicated by LORD NORMAND ([1953] 1 All E.R. 752, 753) that the activities there under review, which were in the event held to amount in effect to those of a recreational club, would have qualified for the privileges of a charity had they been but incidental to the purpose of improving the efficiency of the police force and of the encouragement of recruiting thereto.

Counsel for the Crown did not, indeed, in this court seek to argue the contrary, or to support the broad inference to which HARMAN, J.'s expressions tended. In this court the argument for the Crown went rather on the significance of the social purposes contemplated in the trusts. It was said that the present case was, accordingly, covered by the decision in Williams' case (2) as authorising, as an end in itself, the establishment and conduct of an ordinary social club. As a matter of the construction of the deeds, I do not think such a result is justified or in accordance with the true purpose of the trusts which I have above stated by reference to the judgment of JENKINS, L.J. Nor do I accept the view, much pressed on us on behalf of the Crown, that the present case on its facts is in pari materia with Dunne v. Byrne (8), and Farley v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (9). No doubt, wide discretions are vested by the two conveyances in the "leaders" therein referred to, but the discretions, in my judgment, relate, not to the choice of objects, but only to the means whereby the objects are attained. It was, I think, of the essence of the decision in Dunne v. Byrne (8) that the purposes of the disposition there under review covered objects which could not fairly be regarded as being for the advancement of religion, even though the Archbishop of Brisbane might think them conducive to that end, thereby exposing its language to and the same vice was fatal to the appeal of the vicars and churchwardens in the Farley case (9).

"such latitude of construction as to raise no trust which a court of equity could carry into execution . . . "*.

But the contentions of the Crown proceeded also from a somewhat broader premise, involving, as will be seen, the greatest refinement of argument which they based on the final paragraph in LORD SIMONDS' opinion in the Williams' case (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 520, 521). For it was said that, although trusts of premises "for the purposes of a village hall" would be good charitable trusts on the ground that thereby something was added to the common stock, and that in the absence of express language the purposes would be deemed by the court to be exclusively charitable, nevertheless a trust of a building to be used for such purposes as those for which village halls are commonly held would not be charitable on the ground that there was thereby comprehended the possibility of its use for non-charitable purposes, e.g., solely for social or recreational purposes. It is not necessary in the present case to express a view on the justification for this suggested refinement. The Crown, however, proceeded to contend that the true test to be applied for determining whether a trust fell within the fourth class in LORD MACNAGHTEN'S classification involved, first, the process of striking out from the Elizabethan preamble all the language to which the first three claims were attributable. This process, if adopted, would leave for present purposes little or nothing but the references to bridges, causeways and highways, and so counsel for the Crown, carrying the argument to a reductio ad absurdum, rhetorically asked: "Who has ever heard of a bridge to be crossed only by impecunious Methodists?"

I agree with JENKINS, L.J., in rejecting this contention and also with his opinion that no support can properly be found for it in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Strakosch (10) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 7). For myself, I make bold to call the argument a heresy without any warrant in authority. It would involve a complete re-casting of both the language and the sense of the preamble, and would turn it into an exhaustive definition of charities (a task never yet attempted by Parliament) by way of a catalogue of mutually exclusive activities. The preamble has always, in my understanding, been treated by the courts as containing a number of instances from which, and from the fair analogies to which, the overriding but unexpressed conception of charity may be deduced or discerned, and I think that the fallacy of the argument may be seen from the circumstance that, for example, the words "relief of aged, impotent and poor people" must plainly be relevant to some institutions which are admittedly charitable, but which are none the less outside the scope of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S first class. If those, or any other, words, having done duty, as it were, in providing the justification for one or other of the first three classes, are to be treated as thenceforward eliminated for all other purposes from the preamble, the words that remain, even when full allowance for analogies is made, must inevitably have a scope much more restricted and too confined to admit many activities, of the kind illustrated in my brother's judgment and long since regarded as charitable, into the fair limits of the fourth class.

For the reasons which I have given, I have not been persuaded by any of the arguments put forward in support of the judgment under appeal, and I return, accordingly, to re-state the main purpose of the trusts of the present deeds, viz., the promotion of religious (or moral) social and physical well-being—in other words, for the attainment of the improved performance by those for whom the trust is established of their duties to God (or their consciences), their neighbours, and themselves. It is, in my judgment, legitimate also on the special language in the present case to rely on the conjunctive “and”. I do not say that all the means adopted must serve to promote at one and the same time all three aspects of the general purpose, but each aspect must be read in the context of the other two, so that, in my view, the trusts do not contemplate the use of the property conveyed exclusively for the promotion of one branch of the triple object in isolation from the other two, e.g., the promotion exclusively of social activities as a distinct end in itself, so as to justify no more than the establishment and maintenance of a social club. For these reasons, I think that the main purpose in each case is within the spirit and intendment of the statute of Elizabeth I.

On the second question, whether the class of persons intended to be benefited can properly be treated as a section of the public, I wish to add but three sentences, for on this matter I agree with the conclusion of the judge below. It is, no doubt, true that a power of selection is vested in the leaders referred to in the conveyances, but it does not seem to me that such a power affects the main characteristics of the class defined any more than would a power of selection of the most suitable candidates vitiate the charitable quality of an otherwise good educational trust. In my view, such a power of selection does not have the effect of making the objects of the trust a number of private persons whose essential quality or character for the purposes under review can properly be stated as relationship by the fact of blood, employment, or otherwise to some specified person or persons. The essential quality or characteristic of the intended beneficiaries in the present case remains that of being inhabitants of West Ham or Leyton, albeit that they are but a class of such inhabitants, and they fall, accordingly, within the language of LORD WRENBURY in Verge v. Somerville (11) ([1924] A.C. 499):

“The inhabitants of a parish or town, or any particular class of such inhabitants, may, for instance, be the objects of such a gift, but private individuals, or a fluctuating body of private individuals, cannot.”

For these reasons, these appeals, in my judgment, should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: Each of these two cases raises the question whether a conveyance of property to the appellant trustees on certain trusts was a conveyance to a body of persons established for charitable purposes only, or to the trustees of a trust so established, within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1947, s. 54 (1), so as to attract ad valorem stamp duty at the rate of 10s. per £50 and not at the increased rate of £1 per £50 imposed by s. 52 of that Act. The commissioners have held that stamp duty at the increased rate is exigible on both conveyances, and HARMAN, J., on appeals by Cases Stated, has in each instance affirmed their decision, on the ground that neither conveyance was made to a body of persons, or to the trustees of a trust, established for charitable purposes only, within the legal definition of “charity”. The trustees now appeal to this court with respect to both conveyances, and the issue in the two appeals, easier to state than to determine, is whether the trusts declared by those documents or either of them are, in the eye of the law, exclusively charitable trusts.

The two conveyances are both dated Aug. 21, 1951, and the property conveyed was in both cases provided by a Mr. Bernard Baddeley (therein referred to as "the donor") and conveyed by him, or, in the first case, at his direction by a vendor to him, to himself and the same six other persons as trustees. The conveyance in the first case (which I will call "the first conveyance")
A comprised property described in the schedule thereto as a piece of land

"situate at Stratford in the county of Essex and containing six hundred and eighty square yards or thereabouts . . . together with all those premises including a mission church lecture room and store erected on the said piece of land or on some part thereof",

B and is referred to in a recital as the property from which "the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission is at present conducted."

The trusts declared by the first conveyance (so far as material for the present purpose) are set out in cl. 2 thereof, which is in these terms:

"The trustees shall hold the property hereby conveyed (hereinafter called 'the said property') upon the trusts following that is to say: (a)
C The trustees shall permit the said property to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under the name of 'the Newtown Trust' (hereinafter called 'the Foundation') for the promotion of the religious social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton
D in the county of Essex by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction and for the social and physical training and recreation of such aforementioned persons who for the time being are in the opinion of such leaders members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents and by the provision of facilities for religious
E social and physical training and recreation and by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons Provided always that the trustees shall not at any time hereafter and so long as the trusts hereby declared shall not have totally failed use or permit the said property to be used
F either for physical training or physical recreation or any kind of games on Sundays Christmas Days or Good Fridays or for the sale or consumption of intoxicating drink. (b) The trustees may from time to time:—(i) maintain the said property or any part thereof as a centre for religious services and instruction and for social and physical training and recreation; (ii)
G maintain the buildings now standing on the said property and erect and maintain such other buildings and works as they consider appropriate for the purposes aforesaid; (iii) accept from such leaders such annual payments as the trustees in their absolute discretion shall consider reasonable for the use of the buildings standing on the said property Provided always that such annual payments shall not exceed £50 in any year so long as such leaders shall pay the cost of heating lighting and cleaning the said premises and the insurance thereof against loss or damage by fire and the H outgoings in respect thereof."

The conveyance in the second case (which I will call "the second conveyance") comprised properties at Ilford in the county of Essex described in a recital as

"the properties described in the first parts of the first second third and fourth schedules hereto, which said properties are now laid out as a playing field and upon parts of which a pavilion and a groundsman's bungalow have been erected."

The trusts declared by the second conveyance concerning these properties, so far as material for the present purpose, are set out in cl. 2 thereof, which is in these terms:

"The trustees shall hold the properties hereby conveyed (hereinafter called 'the said property') upon the trusts following that is to say:—(a) The trustees shall permit the said property to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under the name of 'the Newtown Trust' (hereinafter called 'the Foundation') for the promotion of the moral social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in the county of Essex who for the time being are in the opinion of such leaders members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents by the provision of facilities for moral social and physical training and recreation and by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons Provided always that the trustees shall not at any time hereafter and so long as the trusts hereby declared shall not have totally failed use or permit the said property to be used either for physical training or physical recreation or any kind of game on Sundays Christmas Days or Good Fridays or for the sale or consumption of intoxicating drink. (b) The trustees may from time to time:—(i) maintain the said property or any part thereof as a ground for moral social and physical training and recreation; (ii) maintain the buildings now standing on the said property and erect and maintain such other buildings and works as they consider appropriate for the purposes aforesaid; (iii) maintain a house for the accommodation of the groundsman and his family upon the said property or purchase or take on lease any adjoining or neighbouring land houses or buildings for that purpose."

By cl. 3 of the second conveyance, trusts were declared of a sum of £10,000 paid to the trustees by Mr. Baddeley, cl. 3 (so far as material for the present purpose) being in these terms:

"The trustees shall hold the said sum of £10,000 this day paid to them by the donor (the receipt of which sum the trustees hereby acknowledge) and all donations subscriptions legacies and other moneys which may at any time hereafter be paid to them for that purpose and all real and personal property which may at any time hereafter be conveyed transferred devised or bequeathed to them for that purpose Upon trust to use and apply the same for the general purposes of the Foundation as if the same were capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1925, from land settled by this deed in such manner as the trustees shall think most beneficial for promoting the objects of the charity hereby constituted."

These being the relevant provisions of the two conveyances, I should next proceed to construe the trusts in order to ascertain the true nature of the purposes to which the yardstick of legal charity has to be applied. It is agreed that in cl. 2 (a) of the first conveyance the words are tautologous and make no intelligible addition to the content of the clause. Omitting them, I find cl. 2 (a) of the first conveyance susceptible of the following analysis:—The trustees are to permit the property conveyed to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission for the promotion of the religious, social and physical well-being of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton, (i) by the provision of facilities (a) for religious services and instruction, and (b) for the social and physical training and recreation of persons so resident who for the time being are, in the opinion of such leaders, members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by (which I take to mean advantages of the nature provided by) the first conveyance, and (ii) by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons (which I take to mean persons answering the description given in (i) (b) above), but subject to the proviso that the trustees are not to permit the property to be used for physical training or physical recreation or for any kind of game on Sundays, Christmas Days or Good Fridays, or (at any time) for the sale or consumption of intoxicating drink.

"and by the provision of facilities for religious social and physical training and recreation"

From this analysis, the following points emerge: First, the one and only object of the trust is the promotion of the religious, social and physical well-being of persons resident in the two county boroughs referred to. The rest of the trust is concerned with the means by which that end is to be achieved. It is impossible, without doing violence to the language of the clause, to construe it as prescribing three separate and distinct objects, viz., (a) the promotion of religious well-being, (b) the promotion of social well-being, and (c) the promotion of physical well-being. One state of complete well-being is set as the goal of the Foundation, and it is defined as having three aspects, religious, social, and physical. The trust will not be satisfied by the pursuit of any one aspect of this threefold state of well-being to the exclusion of the rest. It demands the pursuit of all three. Secondly, the promotion of well-being, to my mind, denotes improvement. The object of the trust can thus be re-stated as the religious, social and physical improvement of persons resident in the two county boroughs. In other words, the object may be said to be to make persons resident in the two county boroughs better people than they were before in their religious beliefs and observances, in their social relations, and in their bodily health.

Thirdly, social and physical well-being cannot, in my opinion, in this context connote mere social enjoyment or mere indulgence in sport, nor, in my view, can the former connote mere material advancement in "society" or "the social scale" in the popular sense of those expressions. Just as "religious well-being" demands the attainment of those standards in faith and in works which are expected of a good Christian, so does social well-being in this context, to my mind, demand the attainment of those standards of secular conduct and behaviour, and one might say of "manners", in the old-fashioned sense, expected of a good neighbour and a good citizen. Again, "physical well-being", though it may be in some measure attained by healthy varieties of sport, cannot, to my mind, here mean mere skill in or fitness for sporting pursuits. In the context, I think it should be regarded as denoting that bodily health without which the other two aspects of the threefold state of well-being aimed at by the trust cannot well be attained. A succinct and, I think, not unwarranted paraphrase of the object of the trust is to describe it as the promotion of the performance by persons resident in the two boroughs of their duty towards God, their duty towards their neighbour, and their duty towards their own bodies as instruments on the healthy condition of which the proper performance of the other two duties in great measure depends.

Fourthly, the remaining provisions of cl. 2 are directed to the means whereby the object of the trust, as already defined, is to be attained. The means prescribed consist, first, of the provision of facilities of two kinds, i.e., facilities for religious services and instruction and facilities for social and physical training and recreation, the latter kind of facilities, but, according to the grammatical structure of the clause, not the former, being limited to such of the persons resident in the two county boroughs as are, in the opinion of the "leaders", members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church, and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy advantages of the nature provided by the trust, and consist, secondly, of the promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons, which, as I have already indicated, must, I think, mean persons of the same description as those for whom facilities of the second kind mentioned above are to be provided. It should be noted that the last-mentioned facilities are to extend to social training as well as to social recreation and to physical training as well as to physical recreation. And, so far as the means of attaining the object of the trust consist of the promotion and encouragement of "activities calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons", I think the previous use of the expression "well-being" in the definition of the object of the trust suffices to indicate that the same expression is used in a similar sense in the phrase "health and well-being", so that the activities to be promoted are to be such as are calculated to contribute to the religious and social well-being as well as the health, that is to say, the physical well-being, of the persons referred to, or, in other words, calculated to further, in relation to such persons, the object of the trust as previously defined.

The corresponding provisions of the second conveyance differ from the first in the following respects. First, the object of the trust is defined in cl. 2 (a) as "the promotion of the moral, social and physical well-being" of the class of beneficiaries therein described, "moral" thus taking the place occupied by "religious" well-being in the first conveyance. This change of language is presumably due to the fact that, whereas the property comprised in the first conveyance included a mission church and lecture room, where religious services and instruction could conveniently and appropriately be carried on, the property comprised in the second conveyance consisted of a playing field, pavilion and groundsman's bungalow, and was thus hardly suitable for formal religious instruction or observances. But, whatever the reason for the change of language, the claim to charitable status of the trust declared by the second conveyance must be judged on the footing that its object is the promotion of "moral social and physical well-being" and not the promotion of "religious social and physical well-being" as in the case of the trust declared by the first conveyance. As I have said before, I think the "promotion of well-being" is equivalent to "improvement". This makes the trust declared by the second conveyance a trust for moral, social and physical improvement. Moral improvement, I think, would, undoubtedly, include religious improvement, but it is a wider term, and would also extend to the inculcation of a desirable code of secular ethics, e.g., the secular (though also Christian) virtues of honesty, fair play, unselfishness and so on. Moral improvement, in its wider significance, to some extent overlaps with social improvement in the sense I have attributed to "social improvement" in my analysis of the corresponding provisions of the first conveyance. But I think the two conceptions are sufficiently distinct to warrant the attribution to "social well-being" in the second conveyance of the same meaning as I have assigned to it in the first. My observations in relation to the first conveyance to the effect that it prescribes one object with three aspects apply equally to the second, the only difference being that, in the case of the latter, one of the three aspects is "moral" instead of "religious" well-being.

Secondly, the class of beneficiaries prescribed by cl. 2 (a) of the second conveyance is defined for all purposes as consisting not simply of persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton, but of persons so resident who for the time being are, in the opinion of the leaders of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission, members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the second conveyance, whereas under the first conveyance these qualifications in regard to church membership or likelihood of church membership and insufficiency of means are, as pointed out above, only applicable to certain of the means prescribed for the attainment of the object of the trust (i.e., the provision of facilities for social and physical training and recreation and the promotion and encouragement of activities calculated to contribute to health and well-being) and do not apply to the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction.

Thirdly, in conformity with the substitution of "moral" for "religious" well-being in the object of the trust, the means prescribed by cl. 2 (a) of the second conveyance take the form of (a) the provision of facilities for moral, social and physical training and recreation, and (b) the promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons. It should be noted that, as in the case of the first conveyance, these are not in themselves substantive objects, but merely means prescribed for the attainment of the sole tripartite object already declared, and further that, with the substitution of "moral" for "religious" well-being, the observations made above as to the meaning of "health and well-being" in the second conveyance apply equally here.

Such being, in my opinion, the true construction of the trust declared by each of the two conveyances, and the true character of the object of such trust ascertained with due regard to the distinction between object and means, I pass to the question whether in both or either of the two cases the object of the trust falls wholly within the ambit of legal charity. In view of the form taken by one of the arguments presented on behalf of the Crown, I find it necessary to begin my consideration of this question by attempting a return to first principles. The starting point for this purpose is the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I (43 Eliz. I, c. 4). Of that enactment, LORD MACNAGHTEN said in Pemsel's case (3) ([1891] A.C. 581):

"The object of that statute was merely to provide new machinery for the reformation of abuses in regard to charities. But by a singular construction it was held to authorise certain gifts to charity which otherwise would have been void. And it contained in the preamble a list of charities so varied and comprehensive that it became the practice of the court to refer to it as a sort of index or chart. At the same time it has never been forgotten that the 'objects there enumerated', as LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., observes, 'are not to be taken as the only objects of charity but are given as instances'."

In the same speech (ibid., 583) comes the celebrated classification of charitable purposes which, as pointed out by LINDLEY, L.J., in Re Macduff (4) ([1896] 2 Ch. 467), is a paraphrase of SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY's argument in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (12) (10 Ves. 532):

" 'Charity' in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads."

It is, of course, well settled that, although this classification only mentions benefit to the community under its fourth head, no trust, to whichever head it is sought to be assigned, is charitable unless it is directed to the public benefit: see Oppenheim v. Tobacco Securities Trust Co., Ltd. (13). On the other hand, it is equally well settled that a trust is not to be held charitable merely because it is directed to the public benefit, and that to be so held a trust must be not only directed to the public benefit but also within the spirit and intendment of the statute of Elizabeth I. In other words, it must be both (a) beneficial to the community and (b) beneficial in a way the law regards as charitable: see Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 519). There is, however, a class of cases typified by Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (14), which are by no means easy to reconcile with the general proposition I have just stated, because they appear to proceed on the ground thus formulated by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in that case (7 App. Cas. 642):

"A gift subject to a condition or trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town, or of any particular class of such inhabitants, is (as I understand the law) a charitable trust . . ."

In view of the comments made on this line of cases in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 521) it would seem that they should not now be regarded as authoritative save in so far as they can be explained on the ground that the particular purpose was regarded as falling within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I.

For reasons which will hereafter appear, I propose in the first instance to assume that the persons to whose benefit the trust in each of the two cases now before the court is directed constitute a sufficient section of the community to provide that element of public benefit which is essential to all legal charity. On this assumption, how does the trust in each case stand in relation to LORD MACNAGHTEN'S classification. To pursue that inquiry head by head: First, is either trust for the relief of poverty? This was affirmatively argued by counsel for the trustees in both cases on the strength of the references in both conveyances to "persons . . . in the opinion of such leaders . . . of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents."

He submitted, in my view rightly, that "poverty" in relation to charity is a relative term not confined to destitution, and referred to Re De Carteret (15) as typical of the authorities on this point. He contended, therefore, that insufficiency of means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the two conveyances amounted to "poverty" in the charitable sense, and that the provision of those advantages for persons labouring under such insufficiency of means accordingly amounted to relief of poverty. I cannot accept this argument, which, to my mind, involves an unwarrantable extension of the charitable conception of relief of poverty. It should be noted, however, that the trust in each case has a certain affinity to trusts for the relief of poverty, in that it is designed to provide benefits for persons who cannot afford to provide similar benefits for themselves. Secondly, is either trust for the advancement of education? The answer here must, I think, be "No", though the object in each case is akin to the advancement of education in the sense that "religious social and physical improvement" or "moral social and physical improvement" may be said to form part of any liberal scheme of education and, indeed, to comprise some of the essential purposes of any education worthy of the name. Thirdly, is either trust for the advancement of religion? The answer here, as regards the first conveyance, must be: "Partly, but not exclusively", for religious improvement is only one of the three ingredients in the tripartite object. As regards the second conveyance, the answer must be: "At best no more than partly so, and only partly so in the sense that moral improvement may be said to include religious improvement". Fourthly and finally, is either trust for some exclusively charitable purpose beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads? The elimination of the first three heads means that if either trust is to qualify for charitable status at all, it must do so under this fourth head.

On this part of the case there was presented on behalf of the Crown an argument which, I confess, was new to me. It is of this nature: In order to determine whether a given trust is charitable, one must set LORD MACNAGHTEN'S

- classification alongside the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I, and ask oneself with respect to each of the first three heads seriatim whether the trust is charitable under that head. As each head is eliminated as inapplicable to the particular case, one must strike out of the preamble all instances of charity referable to that head. If the trust under consideration cannot be brought strictly within any of the first three heads, or a combination of any two or more of them, then it can only be charitable under the fourth head if it strictly corresponds to, or bears a sufficiently close analogy to, one of the few remaining instances of charity which are left in the preamble after those referable to the first three heads have been struck out. In other words, according to this argument, a trust in order to be charitable must be either (i) strictly for the relief of poverty, or (ii) strictly for the advancement of education, or (iii) strictly for the advancement of religion; or else, failing these three, it must be (iv) for some purpose mentioned in, or analogous to some purpose mentioned in, the preamble, exclusive of those purposes mentioned in the preamble which have been eliminated as referable to any of the first three heads. I find it difficult to say exactly what instances of charity are to be taken as remaining in the preamble after the process of elimination above described has been carried out. But, for the purposes of the argument I am now stating, they can, I think, be regarded as comprising such purposes as "the repair of bridges ports havens causeways . . . sea banks and highways". I omit churches from this enumeration as referable to, and, indeed, providing the whole basis for, the third head of the classification. Thus, according to this argument, if a trust cannot be brought strictly within any of the first three heads of poverty, education and religion, it can only be brought under the fourth head if it has for its object the repair of such things as bridges, highways and the like, or the provision of some benefit analogous to the benefit conferred by such repair. According to the argument I am now stating, the analogy extends, but is confined, to purposes which add to the common stock of the community in the shape of lands, works, buildings and so forth dedicated to general use or enjoyment by the public or a section of the public. Such purposes are said to constitute in themselves a separate and distinct head of charity, so that the provision simpliciter of a village green or village hall for the use of the inhabitants of the village of X, without any definition of the purposes for which such green or hall is to be used, is charitable in its own right, even if the purposes for which it is in fact used (and for which it is obviously intended) are not in themselves of an exclusively charitable nature. On the other hand, it is said that if the trust declared concerning the village green or the village hall defines the purposes for which it is to be used, albeit the very purposes for which premises of that description are invariably used and intended, then the trust is not charitable unless the declared purposes fall strictly within one or other of the first three heads of the classification. It is said further that, for the purposes of the fourth head of charity as delimited by this argument, the public or section of the public to be benefited must be the public at large without any restriction otherwise than by reference to residence in some specified area, and that a class restricted to such members of the public resident in a specified area as are members of some particular religious sect or denomination does not, at all events for the purposes of this head, constitute a sufficient section of the public.
- H The bearing of this argument on the two cases now before the court may be thus stated: (a) The object of the trust in the first conveyance being "the promotion of religious social and physical well-being", and the object of the trust in the second conveyance being the promotion of "moral social and physical well-being", such object does not in either case fall strictly or exclusively within any of the first three heads of the classification. Those three heads and all instances of charity in the preamble which are referable thereto must, therefore, be eliminated from further consideration, and neither trust can claim charitable status by analogy to anything contained in those three heads or those instances. (b) There remains only the fourth head. But this is not available here because, first, the fourth head only includes such things as the repair of bridges and highways and matters analogous thereto, and no such analogy is to be found in the object of either trust. Secondly, the declared object in each case not being strictly or exclusively within any of the first three heads of the classification, and a claim to charitable status by analogy to those three heads being inadmissible where none of them is strictly applicable to the trust in question, the trust is not in either of the two cases charitable at all, and a trust for purposes not in themselves of a charitable nature is not to be held charitable merely because it is directed to the benefit of the public or a section of the public (see Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2)). (c) At all events for the purposes of the fourth head, the trust is not in either case directed to a class of beneficiaries which amounts to a section of the public, because in the case of the first conveyance all the means prescribed for carrying out the object (other than the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction), and in the case of the second conveyance both the object and the means of carrying it out, are limited to persons resident in the two county boroughs named who, in the opinion of the leaders referred to, are members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the conveyance.

I have stated this argument at some length on account of its novel, and, to my mind, subversive, character. I am not concerned to dispute the charitable character of a trust to provide a village green or a village hall for the use of the inhabitants of the village of X, or that the charitable character of such a trust is referable to the fourth head of the classification. But I am concerned to dispute the proposition that the fourth head of the classification does not admit of the inclusion within the ambit of legal charity of purposes analogous to the relief of poverty, the advancement of education, and the advancement of religion although not strictly comprised in any of those three heads. Re Strakosch (10) was referred to, and it was suggested that support was to be found for the argument in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., where he said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 8):

“LORD MACNAGHTEN’S fourth class is represented in the preamble by the repair of bridges, etc., and possibly by the maintenance of houses of correction.”

But if the passage in which this sentence occurs is read as a whole I think it really tells the other way (ibid.):

“In Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), the House of Lords has laid down very clearly that in order to come within LORD MACNAGHTEN’S fourth class the gift must be not only for the benefit of the community but beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable. In order to satisfy the latter it must be within the ‘spirit and intendment’ of the preamble of the statute of Elizabeth. That preamble set out what were then regarded as purposes which should be treated as charitable in law. It is obvious that as time passed and conditions changed common opinion as to what was properly covered by the word charitable also changed. This has been recognised by the courts as the most cursory examination of the cases shows. In order to be within the spirit and intendment of the preamble we take it that one must find something charitable in the same sense as the recited purposes are charitable. LORD MACNAGHTEN’S fourth class is represented in the preamble by the repair of bridges, etc., and possibly by the maintenance of houses of correction. This negatives any suggestion that 'charitable' must be confined to the poor (Verge v. Somerville (11) [1924] A.C. 502). We have come to the conclusion that, though undoubtedly of benefit to the community, the purpose under consideration is not 'charitable' in the sense in which the benefits to the community instanced in the preamble are charitable. The benefit, as we understand it, does not have to be in any way ejusdem generis with the recited purposes, but it has to be charitable in the same sense."

A There are many cases in the books in which purposes not falling within any of the first three heads have been held to be charitable when they could not possibly have been held such according to the method of applying the classification contended for on behalf of the Crown. I need only refer to Re Wedgwood (16), where a trust for the protection and benefit of animals was (to quote the headnote) ([1915] 1 Ch. 113):

B "Held, a good and valid charitable trust, on the ground that it was calculated to promote public morality by checking the innate tendency to cruelty", and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Yorkshire Agricultural Society (17) where a society whose substantial object was the promotion of agriculture was also held charitable.

C I think this well-known passage in the judgment of CHITTY, J., in Re Foveaux (18), still holds good ([1895] 2 Ch. 504):

D "Cases arise, such as the present, in which it is not easy to ascertain whether a particular institution is or is not a charity. Charity in law is a highly technical term. The method employed by the court is to consider the enumeration of charities in the statute of Elizabeth, bearing in mind that the enumeration is not exhaustive. Institutions whose objects are analogous to those mentioned in the statute are admitted to be charities; and, again, institutions which are analogous to those already admitted by reported decisions are held to be charities. The pursuit of these analogies obviously requires caution and circumspection. After all, the best that can be done is to consider each case as it arises, upon its own special circumstances."

E In my view, given the requisite element of public benefit, the question in any given case is simply whether the trust claimed to be charitable is within the spirit and intendment of the statute of Elizabeth I, and that question is to be answered by reference to the preamble as a whole, and in the light of the decided cases.

F I need not repeat what I have already said about the construction of the two conveyances. My view as to the object of the trust in the first conveyance may be summed up by saying that the object is to make the people to whose benefit it is directed better Christians, better citizens, and better physical specimens, and as to the second conveyance by saying that the object is to make such people morally better, or, in other words, more virtuous persons, better citizens, and better physical specimens. Nor need I repeat what I have already said about the means prescribed for attaining the object of the trust in either case. The salient points here are, first, that they are mere means for attaining the object, and not ends in themselves, and, secondly, that the references which they contain to "training and recreation", not recreation alone, bear out my view as to the improving character of the object itself. A third important consideration is the limitation, partial in the first conveyance and total in the second, of the benefit of the trust to persons resident in the two county boroughs who, in the opinion of the leaders referred to, are "of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by these presents". I omit at this stage the religious qualification as relevant to the question of sufficiency of public benefit, to which I will in due course return.

Given the requisite element of public benefit, and if I am right in the view I have formed as to the true nature of the object of each of these two trusts, is that object charitable within the spirit and intendment of the preamble? In the first case, so far as the object is directed to religious improvement, it falls, of course, fairly within the third specific head of the classification, viz., the advancement of religion. In the second case, so far as the object is directed to moral improvement, there is undoubted authority for the proposition that a trust for the moral improvement of the public in general or of a section of the public is charitable within the spirit and intendment of the preamble although it is not one of the specific instances of charity therein enumerated (see, e.g., Re Wedgwood (16)). I have no difficulty, therefore, so far in according charitable status to both trusts. To deal next with the third aspect of the object of the trust in each case, viz., physical improvement, this aspect is, perhaps, more controversial, but I think that, in principle, a trust for the physical improvement of the public generally or of a section of the public should be held to be within the spirit and intendment of the preamble. I think it would be irrational to exclude physical improvement while including moral improvement. Both objects are in their respective ways equally desirable, and equally in the public interest. Moreover, if it be charitable to relieve sickness, it should by parity of reasoning be charitable to promote physical health. There is at all events some authority in favour of this view and none which, properly understood, can, in my opinion, fairly be held to be against it. But the validity of my conclusion on this point, of course, depends on the correctness of the meaning I have assigned to "the promotion of physical well-being" in the context afforded by the two conveyances. If, contrary to my opinion, it meant what has been termed "the encouragement of mere sport", then there is binding authority for the view that it would not be charitable. Finally, as to the second aspect of the tripartite object, "the promotion of social well-being", or, to use the paraphrase I have ventured to adopt, "social improvement", this aspect of the object, undoubtedly, presents the greatest difficulty. If what is meant is the mere provision of facilities for social enjoyment, then this aspect of the object could not, I think, fairly be brought within the spirit and intendment of the preamble. But if I am right in my view that it bears the meaning I have endeavoured to describe above, then it means in effect the inculcation of socially acceptable standards of conduct and behaviour in relation to other people—standards of conduct and behaviour such as are to be expected of a good neighbour or good citizen—and does, in my opinion, fairly fall within the spirit and intendment of the preamble, for, so viewed, its aim is to promote amongst the persons to whose benefit the trust is directed the practical application of sound ethical principles in their relations with other people, and it is, accordingly, in the nature of a trust for the moral improvement of a section of the public. I am fortified in my conclusion with respect to the second and third aspects of the trust in the first conveyance, and all three aspects of the trust in the second conveyance, not only by the references to training in the prescription of the means by which the object is to be attained, but also by the limitation of the benefit of the trust to persons of insufficient means to enjoy the advantages provided. This imbues the trust with one of the distinctive characteristics of charity. As LORD HALDANE said in A.-G. v. National Provincial & Union Bank of England (5) ([1924] A.C. 267):

"In the case of a gift for charitable purposes there is a desire to profit people who would not be profited without your gift—that is the dominant motive."

If I am right so far, it matters not that the means prescribed in both cases include "recreation" as well as "training". Any scheme of moral, social and physical improvement must, as, indeed, must any scheme of education in the conventional sense, include a greater or less degree of recreation. Training and recreation go hand in hand, and the former is often best achieved through the latter. This is particularly, but not exclusively, true with respect to physical improvement. I would, moreover, repeat that the means prescribed must be viewed as means to an end, not as ends in themselves.

- As seems inevitable in these charity cases, we were referred to a plethora of authorities, to some of which I should next allude. Re Nottage (6) was cited for the proposition that the encouragement of mere sport is not a charitable purpose. With regard to this authority I need only say that, in my view, neither of the trusts here in question is a trust for the encouragement of mere sport. Somewhat nearer in point is the Irish case of Shillington v. Portadown Urban Council (19), where a trust for providing the means of healthy recreation for the residents of a named town and surrounding districts was held charitable. Reference was also made to Re Mariette (20) and Re Gray (21), as bearing on the charitable character of trusts for the promotion of physical efficiency. In the former case the provision of facilities for games and a prize for athletic sports at a school, were held charitable on the ground that bodily development was just as much a part of education as mental development, and, accordingly, that these gifts were charitable as being for the advancement of education. In the latter case, the provision of the nucleus of a fund for the promotion of certain outdoor sports in a particular regiment was held charitable as being for the promotion of the physical efficiency of the army, following Re Good (22), where a trust to provide a library for an officers' mess was held charitable as tending to promote the mental efficiency of the army. These cases are, of course, far removed in subject-matter from the two cases now before the court, but I think they are of some assistance as showing that a trust for physical, no less than mental or moral, improvement may be charitable.

- We were also referred to Re Hadden (23), where a trust, inter alia, to provide playing fields, parks and gymnasiums in, in effect, centres of working-class population, was held on construction to have for its object the health and welfare of the working classes by the supply of healthy recreation mainly in the open air, and, in particular, by providing playing fields, parks and gymnasiums, and as such to be a valid charitable gift, the learned judge founding himself primarily on the recognition contained in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, s. 6, of the dedication of land to the recreation of the public as a charitable use. In Re Scowcroft (24) a gift to the vicar for the time being of a parish or a building used as a village club and reading room

- “to be maintained for the furtherance of conservative principles and religious and mental improvement”

- was held charitable, notwithstanding the inclusion of the reference to conservative principles, as being in effect a gift for the furtherance of religious and mental improvement amongst a section of the public. Re Mann (25) was a case of a gift to an institute established for the general benefit of the inhabitants of a named village, and this was held charitable as being for the benefit of the inhabitants. The authority of this case is, perhaps, open to question in view of what was said in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) about the class of cases headed by Goodman v. Saltash Corpn.^a (14). In Re Spence (26) a gift to a local authority for the erection of a hall for public purposes was held charitable. This is, perhaps, open to the same comment. In Crystal Palace Trustees v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (27) the objects of the Crystal Palace, which was to be held, inter alia, as a place of public resort and recreation, were held to be charitable.

Nearer the mark for present purposes is the Irish case of Londonderry Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). The objects of the trust there in question are thus set out (27 Tax Cas. 435):

“The appellants are the present trustees of a deed of trust dated Nov. 21, 1922, whereby the trusts affecting the property concerned are declared in the following terms: 'Upon trust to permit the same or any part thereof to be used as a hall for meetings or for social or recreation purposes in connection with the various Presbyterian churches in the city of Londonderry and the surrounding district or as a hostel or boarding house or as a library or for such other purpose or purposes as the board of governors hereinafter defined or any board of governors or committee to be substituted therefor in manner hereinafter appearing shall from time to time think fit it being the true intention and meaning of these presents that said premises shall be used for the purposes of assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian Church in the city of Londonderry and surrounding district in such manner as the said board of governors or substituted board of governors or committee shall from time to time think right'."

MACDERMOTT, J., in a closely reasoned judgment, held these trusts to be charitable. His decision was reversed in the Court of Appeal. SIR JAMES ANDREWS, C.J., said (ibid., 446):

"The authorities, whose number is legion, upon whether particular trusts fall within or without LORD MACNAGHTEN's fourth category, baffle all efforts on my part to reconcile them with one another, and no useful purpose would be served in the circumstances by reviewing them. Judicial minds have operated not always consistently on facts admittedly different; and the result can only be described as in a measure chaotic. I shall simply content myself with saying that I find nothing in the statutes referred to which would assist me in holding that the trusts in the present case for religious, moral, social and recreative purposes, excluded as I have held them to be from LORD MACNAGHTEN's third class, fall within the fourth class as a valid charitable trust. The test is not whether the objects or purposes aimed at are beneficial to or receive the general acceptance of the community. It is simply whether they conform or not to the requirements and essentials of a legal charity."

The case is also relevant on the question whether persons of a particular religious denomination resident in a specified area are or are not a sufficient section of the public for the purposes of a charitable gift. MACDERMOTT, J., and SIR JAMES ANDREWS, C.J., held that they did, BABINGTON, L.J., held that they did not, while BLACK, J., expressed no opinion on the point.

Comparison of the trusts in the Londonderry case (1) with those in the two conveyances with which we are here concerned seems to me to show that case to be clearly distinguishable. The trusts in the Londonderry case (1) begin by enumerating a wide range of purposes by no means all of which would necessarily be charitable, and end by saying (ibid., 435):

"... the true intention and meaning of these presents that said premises shall be used for the purposes of assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian Church in the city of Londonderry and surrounding district in such manner as the said board of governors or substituted board of governors or committee shall from time to time think right."

Trusts in such a form are, I think, well capable of being held to range beyond the ambit of legal charity without involving a similar conclusion in the two present cases.

The case of Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) is a decision of the House of Lords and as such, of course, binding on this court. But there, again, the objects were different from and wider than those in the present two cases. It is further to be observed that the basis of LORD SIMONDS' opinion is contained in this passage ([1947] 1 All E.R. 519):

"But it is just because the purpose of the trust deed in this case is said to be beneficial to the community or a section of the community and for no other reason that its charitable character is asserted. It is not alleged that the trust is (a) for the benefit of the community and (b) beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable. Therefore, as it seems to me, in its mere statement the claim is imperfect and must fail."

It should be added that in summarising his view as to the quality of the trusts there in question LORD NORMAND said (ibid., 521):

A "In the present case the decision of the commissioners was that, while certain features of the institute conformed to the idea of charity, they were not so dominating nor was the general character of the institute such as effectively to distinguish it from an ordinary social club. In my opinion, this conclusion is amply supported by the facts and is well founded in law."

B If, on the true construction of the two conveyances here in question, the purposes of the trusts were those of a social club, then, of course, they would not be charitable. If, on the other hand, the construction I have placed on the two conveyances is right, then, in my view, the trusts are charitable. In the end, all turns on the construction of the two conveyances.

C Much reliance was placed for the Crown on Dunne v. Byrne (8), where, to quote the headnote ([1912] A.C. 407), it was held that a residuary bequest "to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Brisbane and his successors to be used and expended wholly or in part as such archbishop may judge most conducive to the good of religion in his diocese" was not a good charitable bequest and was void. The expression used by the testator is not identical with the expression "for religious purposes". But as to the argument D founded on this case and Farley v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (9), where a gift "for parish work" was held not to be charitable, I would observe that they proceeded on the ground that the objects authorised extended to purposes other than religious purposes in the strictly charitable sense, and that, once it was found that the purposes prescribed were not strictly religious purposes, there was no other head of charity to which they could be assigned. E But, if the view I have formed as to the true construction of these two conveyances is right, then the object prescribed in each of the two cases is an exclusively charitable object.

We were also referred to Inland Revenue Comrs. v. City of Glasgow Police Athletic Asscn. (7), but I do not think it has any bearing here, the decision of the House of Lords being simply to the effect that the association there in question had two objects, one of which, viz., the increasing of the efficiency of the police force, was charitable, while the other, viz., the benefit of its own members as individuals, was not, and, accordingly, that the association was not established for charitable purposes only. I should, however, observe that with respect to Re Good (22) and Re Gray (21), LORD NORMAND said ([1953] 1 All E.R. 749):

G "... so far as they are founded on the principle that gifts exclusively for the purpose of promoting the efficiency of the armed forces are good charitable gifts, they are, in my opinion, unassailable, but that the decision that the actual gifts were of that nature is more doubtful";

H and that LORD MORTON (ibid., 755) expressed his concurrence in this comment on those two cases. Finally, on this part of the case, I should mention, that in the course of the argument, we were referred to a large number of Acts of Parliament as giving, in effect, statutory recognition to the charitable status of public open spaces, parks, recreation grounds and the like. I will not burden this already over-long judgment by referring to them in detail. Suffice it to say that, so far as they go, they, perhaps, afford some degree of support to the trustees' case (cf. Re Hadden (23)), but, as I have said before, I think the issue really turns on the true construction of the two particular conveyances now before us, and I prefer to found my decision on that.

It remains to consider the question of public benefit. Are persons resident in the county boroughs of West Ham and Leyton who are, in the opinion of the leaders referred to, members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church a sufficient section of the public for the purposes of a charitable trust? Speaking for myself, I have no doubt that they are. The nexus provided by membership of a particular religious sect or persuasion has, so far as I know, never (except by BABINGTON, L.J., in the Londonderry case (1)) been held to be a private or personal one so as to make its members for the purposes of this branch of the law a mere aggregate of private individuals as the employees or former employees of a particular company, though numerous, were held to be in Oppenheim v. Tobacco Securities Trust, Ltd. (13). Certainly this view has never been suggested in the case of educational trusts, although there must be very many educational trusts which are by their terms confined to persons of particular religious sects or persuasions. In particular, large numbers of educational trusts may have been set up since the Reformation for the exclusive benefit of members of the Church of England. All such trusts would be bad as not being for the public benefit if the members of a particular sect or persuasion were held not to constitute a section of the public. Again, trusts for the advancement of religion are commonly confined to members of some particular religious sect or denomination, but have never been held on that account to lack the necessary element of public benefit. If the members of a particular religious sect or denomination resident in a particular area are a section of the public for the purposes of educational or religious charities, I fail to see why they should not also be such for the purposes of any other form of charity, and, accordingly (notwithstanding the contrary views expressed by BABINGTON, L.J., in the Londonderry case (1) (27 Tax Cas. 451), and submitted in argument on behalf of the Crown) I hold them to be such for the purposes of the present case. Plainly the inclusion of prospective or potential members of the particular denomination cannot make the class any the less a section of the public.

It remains only to deal with the submission made for the Crown to the effect that the religious qualification in this case has the effect of making the trusts void for uncertainty. So far as I know, this doctrine has never been applied to religious qualifications prescribed in charitable trusts, and Re Mylne (28) and Re Gott (29) provide some authority for the view that it is inapplicable. It is to be observed, moreover, that here the admission of persons to participation in the benefit of the trust under each conveyance (apart from the exception already noted as regards the first) is made to depend on the leaders' opinion as to their membership of or the likelihood of their becoming members of the Methodist Church. The leaders must form an honest opinion on the matter to the best of their ability, and persons claiming to be eligible must be admitted or rejected in accordance with such opinion. Therefore, so far as I can see, no question of uncertainty arises in the matter of religion, or, I should add, in the matter of insufficiency of means which is also referred to the opinion of the leaders.

Finally, I would say that, in reaching a conclusion favourable to the trustees on the question of public benefit, I have not overlooked what was said in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) as to the difficulty of finding the community to be benefited in that case in view of the extraordinarily wide definition of "Welsh people" contained in the trust deed, but I regard that case as clearly distinguishable, as there seems to me to be no similar difficulty in ascertaining the very differently constituted community to whose benefit the trusts of the two conveyances now before the court are directed. For these reasons, I would allow both appeals.

HODSON, L.J. (read by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.): The first contention of the trustees is that these trusts can be supported as trusts for the relief of poverty. They argued that, in considering the relief of poverty, it was not necessary to confine oneself to cases of destitution. They relied in particular on the judgment of MAUGHAM, J., in Re De Carteret (15), where he declared to be the objects of charity widows with young children whose income was not more than £120 a year. They contended that, since the bare necessities of

- A life are now available to all, the courts must move with the times and the donor of a charitable gift is now bound to provide for a different range of objects. If this last premise is true, which is at least doubtful, it is, I think, not open to the courts to extend the range of poverty in the light of the activities of the welfare State. This must be achieved, if at all, by legislation. When one considers the class of persons described in the trusts, they are not, in my opinion,
- B to be regarded as persons in need. As HARMAN, J., said, the word "relief" in the phrase "relief of aged, impotent and poor people", contained in the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth I, seems to connote need of some sort, need either of a home or of the means to provide for some necessity or quasi-necessity. There is here no suggestion of the relief of poverty in the operative part of the documents, and the donor has sought merely to restrict the benefits given
- C to persons who could not afford certain amenities. The class is not, in my opinion, a class of poor persons within the language of the preamble, nor would the benefits provided have the effect of making them less poor. I am in full agreement with the learned judge in rejecting the contention that this is a poverty case.

- D The main argument of the trustees, however, was directed to showing that the trusts were a good charitable class within the fourth class of Pemsel's case (3) ([1891] A.C. 583) as "trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under . . . the preceding heads,"

- i.e., the heads of poverty, education or religion. Under this head, the authorities are, no doubt, difficult, but the qualification to the fourth class, referred to by
- E LORD SIMONDS in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) and set out in HARMAN, J.'s judgment, must be remembered. The effect is shortly stated thus:

"No trust can be charitable unless it is beneficial to the community in a way which the law regards as charitable."

- F As LORD SIMONDS said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 518):

"... a trust is not charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz., c. 4 . . ."

- Turning to the deeds in question here, the governing words in one case are
- G "for the promotion of the religious social and physical well-being", and in the other case

"the promotion of the moral, social and physical^{*} well-being."

- There follows in each case a description of the class of persons to be benefited by the trusts, being a class of persons resident in the county boroughs of West
- H Ham and Leyton. I agree with the other members of the court that the other relevant provisions of the two deeds only indicate the means to be used to attain the ends prescribed by the governing words. The main difficulty which I have felt is in reading the governing words conjunctively, notwithstanding the link provided by the word "and", particularly having regard to the judgment of SIR JAMES ANDREWS, C.J., in Londonderry Presbyterian Church House Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In that case, the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal reversed a decision of MACDERMOTT, J., who had to consider the following disposition of certain properties (27 Tax Cas. 435):

"Upon trust to permit the same or any part thereof to be used as a hall for meetings or for social or recreation purposes in connection with the various Presbyterian churches in the city of Londonderry and the surrounding district or as a hostel or boarding house or as a library or for such other purpose or purposes as the board of governors hereinafter defined or any board of governors or committee to be substituted therefor in manner hereinafter appearing shall from time to time think fit, it being the true intention and meaning of these presents that said premises shall be used for the purposes of assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian church in the city of Londonderry and surrounding district in such manner as the said board of governors or substituted board of governors or committee shall from time to time think right."

MACDERMOTT, J., considered the various different uses to which the hall might be put as pointing to user for purposes which might be either religious or social or recreative in nature without being anything else, but came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the words of disjunctive user, the words descriptive of the purposes of the trust could properly be read conjunctively in obedience to the guide provided by the word "and". On appeal, SIR JAMES ANDREWS, C.J., took a different view on the construction of the words "religious moral social and recreative life" in their context and found difficulty in holding that every use to which the premises could legitimately be put must assist and help all the four purposes specified. He felt that the proper construction to place on the terms of the trust taken as a whole was that the use of the hall for meetings might assist and help the religious and moral life of those intended to benefit, whilst its use for social and recreative purposes should satisfy their requirements in regard to social and recreative life. He added that both would be within the terms of the trust. He added, further, that he did not regard the question of construction as vital.

A similar question of construction arises in this case, and counsel for the Crown has pressed on us the difficulty of applying the adjectives contained in the governing words of these trusts conjunctively to the various activities which may legitimately take place on the trust property. While I agree with HARMAN, J., that the Londonderry case (1) is a tax case of high persuasive authority, I have finally come to the conclusion that, on the question of construction of the governing words of the deeds now under consideration, it is legitimate to give those words their ordinary grammatical interpretation and to read them conjunctively. In so far, therefore, as this opinion on construction is inconsistent with the reading of similar words in the Londonderry case (1), I would respectfully prefer the construction adopted by MACDERMOTT, J., to that adopted by SIR JAMES ANDREWS, C.J., bearing in mind that on this matter the opinion of the latter was not vital to his decision. Once the difficulty of construction is out of the way, I am content to follow and adopt the reasoning of JENKINS, L.J., throughout, and I feel free from any shackles which might appear to be imposed by the decision of the Londonderry case (1). The objects first stated there were very wide, including, for example, "a hostel or a boarding house", objects which, prima facie, would not be charitable, and the words

"it being the true intention and meaning of these presents that the said premises shall be used for the purposes of assisting and helping in the religious moral social and recreative life of those connected with the Presbyterian Church in the city of Londonderry" can fairly be regarded as insufficient to make charitable what was not charitable before. In this connection, the words "assisting and helping" in the religious, moral and social life are less direct than the words "for the promotion of the religious social and physical well-being" in the one deed and the words "for the promotion of the moral social and physical well-being" in the other. This distinction, though a fine one, is, I think, in line with that adopted by the Privy Council in Dunne v. Byrne (8), where it was held ([1912] A.C. 407) that a bequest was not a good charitable bequest, the language of the testator not being equivalent to "for religious purposes".

- A "to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Brisbane and his successors to be used and expended wholly or in part as such archbishop may judge most conducive to the good of religion in his diocese"

- B Accepting, therefore, the construction placed upon the deeds in question by JENKINS, L.J., I have nothing further to add except to say that I agree with his judgment and that of the Master of the Rolls. Accordingly, I would allow the appeals.

Appeals allowed. Order for excess duty paid to be repaid.

LONDON CEMETERY CO. v. CUNDEY AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), May 12, 13, 1953.]

- D Burial—Burial rights in perpetuity—Duty to maintain plot—Tree falling and causing damage—Liability of grave owner.

- E The plaintiff company, incorporated under a private Act of Parliament (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. cxxxvi) were owners of a cemetery in Highgate, and the defendants were the successors in title to the exclusive right of burial in perpetuity in a plot and vault in the cemetery granted by the plaintiffs to the defendants' predecessors. The plot contained an elm tree expressly mentioned in the grant of burial rights therein, but there was no term in the grant as to who was responsible to keep the tree safe. The tree had been lopped by the plaintiffs in 1924 and 1935 on the instructions and at the expense of the defendants' predecessors. In 1949 the elm tree died, and notice was given to the defendants of that fact, they being asked to
- F arrange for its removal in case of damage to the defendants' and neighbouring memorials, but no action was taken. On Nov. 3, 1950, the tree fell, causing damage to neighbouring memorials, but leaving the defendants' memorials undamaged. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the cost incurred or to be incurred by them in repairing the damaged memorials,

- G HELD: under the private Act the plaintiffs had no power to sell or dispose of any of the land consecrated or set apart for the burial of the dead, but could only grant limited rights of burial; the only terms which could be implied in that transaction were those implied in other contracts, namely, such terms as were necessary to give it business efficacy; it was not necessary for that purpose to imply a term that the grave owners for the time being should maintain the safety of the tree; and, therefore, the
- H plaintiffs were not entitled to succeed.

Per curiam: Even if in the original grant there had been an express covenant by the grave owner that he would maintain the tree, the burden would not pass to the defendants as assignees of the original grantee as it was a mere personal covenant and not a covenant running with land.

ACTION for an indemnity from the defendants for expenses incurred or to be incurred by the plaintiffs in repairing certain gravestones and monuments.

The plaintiffs were a cemetery company incorporated under a private Act of Parliament (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. cxxxvi) by virtue of which they were the owners of St. James' Cemetery in Highgate. The defendants were the executors and residuary devisees and legatees under the will of their mother, Mabel Cundey, and successors in title to certain rights in the Cundey family vault in the Highgate cemetery. On June 13, 1882, the plaintiffs granted to Samuel Cundey, his heirs, and assigns the exclusive right of burial in a plot 347 square feet in area and containing a "reserve brick vault". The plot was numbered 25,067 and this was entered in the plaintiffs' graves register. In 1883 Samuel Cundey died and was buried in the vault. His widow, Eliza Cundey, assigned to herself and her three children Annie, Howard and Oliver

"the exclusive right of burial or interment in all that brick vault and its appurtenances situated and being in the consecrated part of the Highgate cemetery of St. James in the parish of St. Pancras, Highgate, in the county of Middlesex distinguished by the number 25,067, which was granted to the late Samuel Cundey in perpetuity by the London Cemetery Co., by an entry bearing the date June 13, 1882, and all my estate, title and interest therein or thereto, to hold the same unto [herself and the three named children] their executors, administrators and assigns, subject to the same conditions as I held the same immediately before the execution hereof."

On Mar. 27, 1885, the plaintiffs granted to the assignees a further plot of 126 square feet contiguous with the old plot. This new plot contained an elm tree which was expressly mentioned in the grant, and this new grant was entered in the register as being "extra ground" to the original vault. HIS LORDSHIP found as a fact that the reason the extra ground was acquired was largely to enjoy the amenity of the tree.

In 1907 Eliza Cundey died, having been predeceased by Annie and Oliver, and thus leaving Howard Cundey as the sole survivor. On May 27, 1909, Howard Cundey executed an assignment of the burial rights in the grave to himself and his wife Mabel, in terms similar to those of the original assignment. In March, 1924, the elm tree on the burial plot was well lopped by the plaintiffs on the instructions of Howard Cundey and at his expense. No evidence was given whether this lopping was done as a matter of legal obligation or as one of filial piety. In 1927 Howard Cundey died, followed in 1931 by his wife Mabel, and probate was granted to the two defendants, her sons, who were the executors, residuary devisees, and legatees of their mother's will, no particular mention being made in the will to the burial rights in the family vault. In 1935 the elm tree was lopped on the instructions and at the expense of the first defendant. On Mar. 28, 1949, it was noticed that the elm tree had died and the secretary of the plaintiffs informed the first defendant of this fact by letter, indicating that the first defendant might call to see him "or arrange with a firm for its [the tree's] removal in case of damage to yours and other memorials". No action was taken on this letter. On Nov. 3, 1950, the elm tree fell, causing damage to the memorials on neighbouring plots, but not damaging the Cundey grave. One of the memorials damaged was repaired at a cost of £177 by the plaintiffs who spent £31 7s. 11d. in having the tree removed, and an estimate for the repair of the remaining memorials damaged by the falling of the tree amounted to £236.

A On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended that there was an obligation on the defendants to maintain the elm tree in good order and to take care that it should not cause damage to the cemetery or graves or monuments therein, it being argued that this obligation arose either (i) as a result of an implied term in the original grant and the fact that the elm tree was expressly mentioned in the amending grant of 1885 and also because the tree had been lopped in 1924 and 1935 at the request and at the expense of the defendants, or one of them, or their predecessors in title, or (ii) as a matter of duty apart from contract. On behalf of the defendants it was contended (i) that there was no such implied term, and (ii) the plaintiffs were debarred from granting under the terms of their statute any right or title to the land from which such a duty could arise, being limited to conferring merely a right of burial in perpetuity.

H. A. P. Fisher for the plaintiffs.

J. C. B. W. Leonard for the defendants.

McNAIR, J.: First, I should refer to certain sections of the private Act under which the Highgate cemetery was established. By cl. 10 of the private Act it is provided:

D "That it shall be lawful for the said company, and they are hereby authorised and empowered, from time to time and at all times from and after the passing of this Act, to sell and dispose of to any person or persons who may be willing or desire to purchase or acquire the same, and at or for such price or prices or sum or sums of money, and under such regulations and restrictions, and subject to such conditions, as the said company shall think proper to require, the exclusive right of burial or interment, either in perpetuity or for a limited period as may be agreed upon, in all and every or any of the vaults, catacombs . . . and places of burial which may be from time to time or at any time erected, made, or built by the said company . . . "

F By cl. 11 provision is made in the statute for the form of grant which the statute requires the company to use when conveying the rights referred to in cl. 10. By cl. 12 it is further provided:

G "That the exclusive right of burial or interment in any vault, catacomb, and burial place which shall be so purchased as aforesaid, and after such purchase shall have been conveyed to the purchaser or purchasers thereof in the manner hereinbefore directed, shall, if in perpetuity, be considered as a personal inheritance, and shall and may, whether granted in perpetuity or for a limited period, be sold and disposed of and assigned in his or their lifetime, or bequeathed by his or their last will and testament . . . "

H That refers to the purchaser or purchasers referred to earlier in the clause. There is set out in the statute the form of what is called "the derivative assignment", and it is provided that

"every such conveyance so made shall be good, valid, and effectual, both at law and in equity, without words of inheritance . . . "

By cl. 14 provision is made for securing, in effect, that no person shall be buried in the private vault which has been assigned to a particular owner or family without the consent of the person for the time being entitled as owner to the exclusive right of burial. Under cl. 16 the company is empowered to take down and remove any monuments, gravestones and such objects as

"shall have been erected or built contrary to the terms and conditions upon which permission to erect or construct the same was granted, or in case such terms and conditions shall not have been complied with, and also to enter upon and resume possession of any grave or vault or other burial place in which the interest of the purchaser of the exclusive right of sepulture therein shall have ceased or determined . . . "

That last clause, on the first reading, rather suggests that, by granting this exclusive right of sepulture to another, the company have parted with possession or occupation of the plot, but it has been conceded—and I think rightly conceded—by counsel for the company, on the authority of R. v. St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington (1), that neither possession in law nor occupation passes from the company to the beneficiary of the grant. Clause 17 requires the company to "keep the said cemeteries . . . chapel or chapels . . . and the several buildings . . . and the external walls and fences thereof, and all other parts of the same, in thorough and complete repair."

Clause 19 requires the company to keep a register of all burials in the consecrated part of the cemetery. Under cl. 43 power is given to the company "to sell and dispose of, either by public auction or private contract [or in other ways] any part or parts of any lands or hereditaments purchased by the said company which shall not be wanted for the purposes of this Act."

But by cl. 44 it is provided:

"That it shall not be lawful for the said company, under the authority of the provisions hereinbefore contained, to sell or dispose of any land which shall have been consecrated or set apart or used for the burial of the dead."

Under cl. 89 provision is made by which the company can make bye-laws generally for the cemetery and for maintaining good order therein. It was under that provision that the regulations which were in force at the time of the grant (to which I will refer in a moment) were made, namely, the regulations of March, 1881. Of those regulations, I think at this stage, it is only necessary for me to refer to reg. 11 and reg. 12, which are in these terms:

"11. A monument or gravestone, first approved by the directors, shall be erected within twelve months from the date of the first interment in any grave in which the exclusive right of burial has been purchased, otherwise the right shall be forfeited. 12. Every monument, gravestone, or other erection, shall be maintained in good order and condition by the owner thereof, otherwise the right of burial shall be forfeited."

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] In these circumstances this claim is made by the plaintiff company against the two defendants claiming reimbursement. Counsel for the plaintiffs, in the course of his argument, was constrained, as I think quite rightly, to admit that it was impossible for him to succeed under the heading of duty inasmuch as the decision to which I have referred—R. v. St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington (1)—precluded him from arguing that any property in the land or right or possession in the land comprised in the plot had passed to the grave owners or their successors so as to impose on them the duties of possessors or occupiers of land, but he submitted that the relationship of the parties to the original transaction in 1885 was such that there must necessarily be implied an obligation on the beneficiaries of the right to burial (whom I will refer to as "the grave owners") to maintain the tree. The argument, as I understood it, ran thus. It was the common intention of the parties, as evidenced by the receipt given in 1885 and the entry in the register at that date, that the grave owners should continue to have the benefit of this tree, which seems to have provided the real reason for the payment of the money for rights over this extra piece of ground. The argument continues that it would be unreasonable to hold that the liability for the maintenance of this tree rested on neither party, and, therefore, it must have been intended to be transferred to the grave owners, who were to get the benefit from the continued existence of that tree. Counsel, while admitting that no true easement was created in favour of the grave owners, there being no servient tenement, argued, on the analogy of the cases relating to easements, that the obligation contended for must rest on the grantee. In support of that was cited, first, Ingram v. Morecraft (2), in which the view was expressed—I think obiter—that where a right of way is granted it is for the dominant tenement to do all that is necessary for making the right of way available. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in his judgment, says (33 Beav. 51):

“If I grant a man a right to lay pipes over my land, it follows that he must keep them watertight, for otherwise the escape of water is a trespass.”

There is the rather similar case of Taylor v. Whitehead (3), where LORD MANSFIELD, in dealing with a similar right of way, expresses the principle in this way (2 Doug. K.B. 750):

“I entirely agree with my brother Walker [i.e., Serjeant Walker, who was arguing for the plaintiff] that, by common law, he who has the use of a thing ought to repair it.”

From those two cases it is argued that, seeing that the grave owners have the use of this plot and that it is for their benefit, the obligation is on them to repair it. I myself do not find those authorities particularly helpful, first, because I think any argument by analogy from such a technical branch of law as the law relating to easements is unreliable, and, secondly, because I do not find that those authorities establish that the owner of the servient tenement would have a right of action against the owner of the easement. They merely say that the owner of the easement has not got a right of action against the owner of the servient tenement.

I think that at this stage it is right that I should express my view of what is the nature of the right conveyed by these documents for the transactions which they evidence. It is quite clear, I think, that in equity (there being no legal conveyance) the main right, if not, indeed, the only right, conveyed is a right of burial in perpetuity. The company, as I have indicated, have not power under cl. 44 to part with any estate or interest in the land. They can only grant under the other provisions of this statute quite limited rights of burial in perpetuity. How limited is this right is shown by cases such as McGough v. Lancaster Burial Board (4), where the Court of Appeal held, under a different, but not dissimilar, statute relating to a burial board, that the grantee only acquired the exclusive right of burial and such a right did not include a right to place a glass shade and wire covering on the grave. Similarly, in Hoskins-Abraham v. Paignton Urban Council (5), where the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the holder of an exclusive right of burial in a cemetery under an Act incorporating the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, had a right to enter the vault there used for the purpose of performing certain ceremonial rights, the court held that the grantee has no freehold interest in the space or the vault and no right to use them for such purposes or to open or enter the vault to deposit articles therein without the consent of the local authority, which, in that case, was the burial authority. GREER, L.J., says ([1929] 1 Ch. 387):

“For my part I cannot find in the statute any power to grant any other right except those which are included in the grant, an exclusive right of burial and a right to erect a tombstone including therein a right from time to time to see to the repair of the tombstone."

In the judgment in McGough's case (4) it is stated by BOWEN, L.J., that the right of the owner of the grave to go on to the land to inspect the grave to see whether it is in a good state of repair was only a licence and was not an interest in the land.

As it seems to me, the question what terms should be implied in a transaction such as this has to be tested by the same tests as according to ordinary common law principles are applicable to other contractual relationships, such as the sale of goods or the charter of a ship, viz.: Is the term, i.e., that the grave owner should maintain the tree, necessary to give such business efficacy to the transaction as both parties must have intended? The test is stated in the very familiar passage in the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois & Power, Son & Co. (6), where the learned lord justice says ([1920] 1 K.B. 899):

"The court . . . ought not to imply a term merely because it would be a reasonable term to include if the parties had thought about the matter, or because one party, if he had thought about the matter, would not have made the contract unless the term was included; it must be such a necessary term that both parties must have intended that it should be a term of the contract, and have only not expressed it because its necessity was so obvious that it was taken for granted."

I see no reason why the enjoyment by the grave owner of the amenity provided by this tree might not equally well have been achieved by leaving the obligation to maintain the tree in good order and condition on the company, where it is laid by statute. I am in no way satisfied that, if, in 1885, the officious bystander had raised the question: "Who is to be responsible in law for the safety of this tree?", both parties, the plaintiffs and Mrs. Eliza Cundey, would immediately have said: "Of course, clearly that is Mrs. Eliza Cundey's liability". If one speculates, I think it is extremely likely that, if they had had the matter in mind, they would have said: "That liability will rest where it rests under statute". Under cl. 17 of the statute the liability of keeping the cemetery in proper repair falls on the company and I see nothing in these circumstances which of necessity requires that that position should be altered.

The argument, as I understood it, in favour of transferring the liability from the company to the grave owner was that, whereas under reg. 12 of the regulations the liability for maintaining the monuments and gravestones and other erections in good order and condition is in terms imposed on the owner, it would be reasonable or necessary that the same provision should be made as regards the maintenance of the trees. That submission does not appeal to me. Indeed, I feel that that argument rather cuts the other way, because here you have an express provision placing on the owner certain obligations for maintenance in good order and condition in terms which are not wide enough to cover the maintenance in good order and condition of an object like a tree. Furthermore, I think it is relevant, in considering whether this term is to be implied, to consider whether a term to the like effect provided for by express terms in the contract would have been effective to bind the defendants in this action. Once it is admitted or established that what passed to the grantee under the statute was not an interest in the land or any estate in the land, it would seem to me, on well-settled principles, that no covenant of this nature imposing the positive burden on the grantee could pass in law to the assignees of the grantee, because it would not be a covenant in any way running with the land, but would be a mere personal covenant, the burden of which can only be passed to subsequent assignees in invitum within very narrow limits. That is an additional reason for excluding this implied term. Again, it seems to me that, if the plaintiffs are right, and, against their will, obligations of this nature may be imposed on the heirs at law and successors in title of the original grantee of such a right, the grant may be in the true sense a hereditas damnosa, and an executor or a residuary legatee may find himself burdened with liabilities of a quite indefinite nature, of which, so far as I can see, he is unable under the statute to disembarass himself.

A For those reasons I am satisfied in my own mind that it would be wrong for the court to imply into this transaction the term for which the plaintiffs contend. That conclusion makes it unnecessary for me to express any view on the defences raised under s. 40 and s. 52 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, or s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. Both these points will be open to the defendants if the case should go elsewhere. I think, however, I should say, as regards damages, that, if liability had been established, I should have found that
B that the damages were as claimed in the statement of claim, either on the ground that the ownership in the neighbouring graves which were damaged rests under the statute in the cemetery company, or, if not, on the ground that the cemetery company, as persons in possession or occupation, have sufficient proprietary interest to maintain an action against the defendants for damage to those gravestones and memorials. In those circumstances there will be
C judgment for the defendants.

D ARAB BANK, LTD. v. BARCLAYS BANK (DOMINION, COLONIAL AND OVERSEAS).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), April 27, 28, 29, 30, May 1, 2, 21, 1953.]

E Bank—War—Effect on credit balance—Payment to Custodian of “Absentee” Property—Right of customer to recover from bank.

F The plaintiffs, the A. Bank, Ltd., were a company incorporated in Palestine in 1930, their head office being in Jerusalem until July 1, 1948, when it was moved to Amman, Jordan, where the plaintiffs became registered on Nov. 7, 1949. The defendants, B. Bank, were a company incorporated in England with branches overseas. In 1939, pursuant to an application by F the plaintiffs to the defendants which included a declaration by the plaintiffs that they submitted themselves irrevocably to the jurisdiction of the courts of Jerusalem, the plaintiffs opened a current account with the defendants' Jerusalem branch. On the termination of the British mandate in Palestine at midnight on May 14/15, 1948, war broke out between the Jews and the Arabs, and a state of war still existed notwithstanding that an armistice was concluded in 1949. The defendants' branch in Jerusalem was
G situated in that part of the city controlled by the Jews, while the plaintiffs' head office, until it was moved from Jerusalem on July 1, 1948, was in that part of the city controlled by the Arabs, and after the termination of the mandate the plaintiffs did not have a branch in Israeli territory. By an ordinance enacted by the State of Israel on May 19, 1948, the law which H existed in Palestine on May 14, 1948 (and which included the common law of England as regards trading with the enemy) was to remain in force in so far as there was nothing repugnant therein to the ordinance or to other laws which might be enacted by the State. By existing regulations, as amended by the State of Israel, it was illegal to make any payment to, or place any sum to the credit of, any person resident outside Israel. By the Emergency Regulations on the Property of Absentees, made by the State of Israel in December, 1948, and replaced in March, 1950, by the Absentee Property Law, any property of an absentee vested in the Custodian of Absentee Property; it was the duty of any person having in his possession any property of an absentee to deliver such property to the Custodian, and, where the property was in the form of a debt or indebtedness to the absentee, to pay the same to the Custodian; and it was an offence, punishable by fine or imprisonment, to pay the debt or indebtedness to anyone other than the Custodian without his written consent. "Absentee" was defined as including any person who owned property in Israel and who was at any time after Nov. 29, 1947, in a part of Palestine to which the law of the State of Israel did not then apply. A company was an absentee, within the regulations, if it was the lawful owner of property in Israel and if at least half of its capital was at the disposition of an absentee or if half of its members or directors were absentees. On Oct. 9, 1950, the plaintiffs commenced an action in the High Court in England for payment of a sum of £582,931, being the sterling equivalent of the balance standing to the credit of their account with the defendants at the time of the termination of the mandate. On Jan. 24, 1951, the Israeli Custodian of Absentee Property requested the defendants' Jerusalem branch to deliver to him all the moneys which they held to the credit of the plaintiffs' account, and on Feb. 8, 1951, the defendants paid to him the amount of the plaintiffs' credit balance. It was contended by the plaintiffs that their contract with the defendants was wholly abrogated by the outbreak of war, that the abrogation extended even to the credit balance, and that the cancellation of the credit balance gave rise to a right in the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants in London, the defendants' chief place of residence, a sum equal to the credit balance, as money had and received or under the doctrine of unjust enrichment.

HELD: the plaintiffs' right to the payment on demand of the balance standing to the credit of their current account immediately before the outbreak of war between the Jews and the Arabs was an accrued right despite the need of a demand before action could be taken to enforce the payment of the balance; the legal effect of the war was not to abrogate that right, but was merely to suspend its enforcement, in which case the credit balance remained in being after the outbreak of war as a debt owing in the State of Israel from the defendants to the plaintiffs, and, by virtue of Israeli law, vested in the Israeli Custodian, and the payment of the balance to him operated as an effective discharge to the defendants for the amount paid; and, therefore, the plaintiffs' claim failed.

Observations of LORD DUNEDIN and LORD SUMNER in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. ([1918] A.C. 269, 289), and of LORD THANKERTON, LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, LORD PORTER, and LORD GODDARD in Schering, Ltd. v. Stockholms Enskilda Bank Aktiebolag ([1946] 1 All E.R. 39, 41, 45, 48, 57), applied.

Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v. Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour, Ltd. ([1942] 2 All E.R. 122), distinguished.

Per curiam: assuming that all rights and obligations under the contract were frustrated under Israeli law by reason of the war between the Arabs and the Jews, there could not arise, in place of them, an obligation on the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs, in another place, a sum equal to the amount of the credit balance as money had and received, as such an obligation would enrich those who were the enemies of Israel in the same way as if the money was paid to them under the contract.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of PARKER, J., dated Nov. 11, 1952, whereby he dismissed their action against the defendants for payment of a sum of £582,931.146, being the sterling equivalent at par of a like sum in Palestine pounds which was the balance standing to the credit of a current account kept by the plaintiffs with the defendants' branch at Allenby Square, Jerusalem, at the time of the termination of the British mandate in Palestine, i.e., at midnight on May 14/15, 1948.

The plaintiffs were a company incorporated in 1930 under the Palestine Companies Ordinance, 1929. At all material times until May 14, 1948, their registered office and head office was at the Anboussie Building just outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem and near the Jaffa Gate. The defendants were a company incorporated in England with a number of branches overseas, including a branch in Allenby Square, Jerusalem, situated outside the walls of the Old City, but only a short distance from them and from the Anboussie Building. The plaintiffs' current account with the defendants' Allenby Square branch was opened in 1939 pursuant to an application made by the plaintiffs to the defendants in a form which included inter alia a declaration by the plaintiffs to the effect that they submitted themselves irrevocably to the jurisdiction of the courts at Jerusalem.

For some time before the termination of the mandate there had been disturbances between the Jews and Arabs in Palestine. The situation deteriorated with the announcement of the United Nations' plan for the partition of Palestine between Jews and Arabs, and it deteriorated yet further with the announcement of His Majesty's government that the mandate was to end at midnight on May 14/15, 1948. Simultaneously with the termination of the mandate the Provisional Council of State and Provisional Government of the State of Israel were constituted by a declaration of independence and a proclamation made thereunder, and, without any formal declaration of war, open war at once broke out between the State of Israel and the Arabs in Palestine supported by the Arab States of Transjordan, Lebanon, Syria, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the Yemen. An armistice was concluded on Apr. 3, 1949, but, technically, a state of war still existed. On the morning of May 14, 1948, the plaintiffs moved their Jerusalem office to the Morcos Building just inside the walls of the Old City, and ceased business at the Anboussie Building. The defendants' Allenby Square branch was situated in a part of Palestine controlled by the Jews, i.e., by the government of the State of Israel. On May 14, 1948, before the mandate ended, the Allenby Square building was occupied by irregular Jewish forces, who forced an entry into it, and on May 15 it was taken over by the regular Jewish forces. The defendants' branch there was closed from May 13 or 14 until July, 1948. The Anboussie and Morcos Buildings, at which the head office of the plaintiffs was successively situated, were in a part of Palestine controlled by the Arabs, the line of war being drawn between Allenby Square on the one side and the Anboussie and Morcos Buildings on the other. The plaintiffs did not at any time after the termination of the mandate have any branches operating in Israeli territory. On July 1, 1948, they moved their head office to Amman in Jordan and became registered there on Nov. 7, 1949.

On May 19, 1948, the State of Israel enacted a Law and Administration Ordinance (No. 1 of 1948), taking effect from May 14, 1948, which provided, by art. 11, that the law which existed in Palestine on May 14, 1948, should remain in force, in so far as there was nothing therein repugnant to the ordinance or to other laws which might be enacted by the State. The law which existed in Palestine on May 14, 1948, included the common law of England as regards trading with the enemy. By the same ordinance the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1941, which were in force in Jerusalem prior to the cessation of the mandate, were continued, subject to the provisions that the power of the High Commissioner thereunder was vested in the provisional government and that the word "Israel" should be substituted for "Palestine" wherever it appeared in the regulations. By reg. 40 of the regulations it was provided:

"Subject to any exemptions which may be granted by order of the High Commissioner, no person shall, except with permission granted by, or on behalf of the High Commissioner (a) draw, issue or negotiate any bill of exchange or promissory note, acknowledge any debt, or make any payment, so that a right (whether actual or contingent) to receive a payment is created or transferred in favour of a person who is resident outside Palestine and Transjordan; or (b) make any payment to, or place any sum to the credit of, any such person."

The effect of those regulations, as so continued and amended, in conjunction with a further amendment published by the State of Israel on July 14, 1948, with retrospective effect from July 4, 1948, was to make it illegal to make any payment to, or place any sum to the credit of, any person resident outside Israel. By regulations published with the authority of the Israeli government on Dec. 12, 1948, and entitled Emergency Regulations on the Property of Absentees, it was enacted that a Custodian of Absentee Property be appointed; that any property of an absentee be vested in the Custodian on his appointment together with any rights of the absentee in such property; that it should be the duty of any person having in his possession any property of an absentee to deliver such property to the Custodian, and, where such property was in the form of a debt or indebtedness to the absentee, to pay the same to the Custodian, or otherwise comply with his obligation thereunder as by him directed; and that no person should pay to anyone other than the Custodian any such debt or indebtedness without the prior written consent of the Custodian on pain of fine or imprisonment as therein mentioned. By the regulations "absentee" was defined as meaning any owner or beneficiary of property situate within the area to which the law of Israel applied who was on Nov. 29, 1947, or at any time thereafter, in either the Lebanon, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Iraq, Transjordan, the Yemen or in the part of Palestine to which the law of the State of Israel did not then apply, and it was provided that a company was such an absentee if it was the lawful owner of property within the area to which the law of Israel applied and if either at least one half of its capital was at the disposition of an absentee or one half of its members, partners, shareholders, directors or managing directors, were absentees. Pursuant to these regulations a Custodian of Absentee Property was appointed on Dec. 12, 1948. The regulations were replaced as from Mar. 31, 1950, by a law known as the Absentee Property Law, 1950, passed by the Israeli government on Mar. 14, 1950. On Apr. 27, 1950, de jure recognition was accorded by His Majesty's government to Israel with a reservation to the effect that no more than de facto recognition was accorded in respect of Israeli sovereignty over the part of Jerusalem occupied by Israel. In April, 1951, His Majesty's government accorded de jure recognition to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (which included the part of Palestine occupied and controlled by the Arabs), with a similar reservation in respect of the part of Jerusalem occupied and controlled by them. The reason for the reservation thus made in respect of Jerusalem was that under the partition plan it was to be international territory.

On Oct. 9, 1950, the plaintiffs issued the writ in the present action. On Jan. 24, 1951, the Israeli Custodian of Absentee Property requested the defendants' Jerusalem branch to deliver to him by cheque all the moneys which they held in the plaintiffs' account, and on Feb. 8, 1951, the defendants' Jerusalem branch handed over to him their cheque for the amount of the plaintiffs' credit balance, namely, the sum of £P582,931.146. Before PARKER, J., the plaintiffs sought, inter alia, to establish a breach of contract by the defendants before the termination of the mandate on the ground that, before the termination, they had made a demand to the defendants' Allenby Square branch for payment of the amount of their credit balance and that demand was not complied with. The learned judge held on this part of the plaintiffs' case " . . . that no demand was ever made on the defendants for the balance of the plaintiffs' account, or for any sum, the non-compliance with which could be said to be a breach."

For the purposes of the appeal counsel for the plaintiffs accepted the learned judge's conclusion on this point. The plaintiffs then contended that the contract was an executory contract which was wholly abrogated by the outbreak of war, that the abrogation extended to the credit balance, and that the cancellation of the credit balance gave rise to the right in the plaintiffs to recover a like amount from the defendants, at their head office in London, as money had and received, or, alternatively, on the ground that the defendants were unjustly enriched to that extent by the cancellation of their contractual indebtedness. PARKER, J., held that the plaintiffs' credit on current account with the defendants was a liquidated sum of money, the right to payment of which was not wiped out by the outbreak of war, but was merely suspended, and, accordingly, he gave judgment for the defendants.

Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., Maurice Lyell and Nasir for the plaintiffs.

Sir Hartley Shawcross, Q.C., Winn and I. S. Warren for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts, and said: The case which was put to this court was that until the British mandate expired there was open at the defendants' Allenby Square branch a current account in the name of the plaintiffs, and the question to be determined was in respect of the amount standing to the credit of the plaintiffs on the date of the expiration of the mandate. As counsel for the plaintiffs pointed out, it would not have been possible for the plaintiffs to make a demand at the defendants' branch on or after May 15, 1948, nor would it have been possible for the defendants in Israel to pay the plaintiffs on the other side of the line, for Israel was at war with the Arabs across the line, and, moreover, the government of Israel passed a law making it illegal for any person in Israel to make a payment outside without government permission. There was correspondence between the head offices of the respective banks, and on Nov. 24, 1948, the general manager of the defendants wrote to the general manager of the plaintiffs at Cairo saying that it was regretted that they were advised that the position was:

"An account at our Allenby Square branch constitutes a debt due from our Allenby Square branch which is legally payable only at or by transfer from that branch. The Jewish authorities who are in de facto control of the area in which our branch is situated will not permit transfer or payment of balances outside territory occupied by them, without their prior authority. Being therefore constrained by reason of force majeure we are unable without such prior authority to pay your balance as requested by you."

An offer was made to approach the Jewish authorities, but nothing came of this, and the writ was issued on Oct. 9, 1950. In February, 1951, the defendants paid to the Israeli Custodian of Enemy Property, at his request, a sum purporting to represent the balance at the branch on the expiration of the mandate. The plaintiffs did not know of this until some considerable time later. I do not know why the defendants did not tell the plaintiffs except that counsel for the defendants said they were advised not to do so. The case put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs is that the contract was frustrated, that the contract of current account went, and that there arose an obligation imposed by law on the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the amount standing to the plaintiffs' credit.

It is necessary to consider what are the implications which arise from the relationship of banker and customer on a current account. In Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (1) it was held that, where money is standing to the credit of a customer on current account with a banker, in the absence of a special agreement a demand by the customer is a necessary ingredient in the cause of action against the banker for money lent. ROCHE, J., had held in the court of first instance ([1921] 3 K.B. 111) that

“ . . . the debt owing by a banker to his customer was in the same position in this respect as a debt owing by any other debtor, and could be sued for without any previous demand; that the evidence given by bankers to show a custom differentiating the case of bankers from that of other debtors failed to prove any such custom . . . ”

A and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. It was held by this court, all the lords justices agreeing, that a demand was necessary. BANKES, L.J., and WARRINGTON, L.J., were inclined to the view that a writ was sufficient demand, but the case should not be regarded as an authority for that proposition. The judgment of ATKIN, L.J., sets out the position as
B of it. ATKIN, L.J., said (ibid. 126):

“ This case raises the question whether the customer of a bank may sue the banker for the balance standing to the credit of his current account without making a previous demand upon the banker for payment. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the circumstances which raise this issue in this case. It is sufficient to state that upon the hearing of a summons for particulars on Mar. 16, 1920, the defendants undertook to limit their causes of action to those arising on or before Aug. 1, 1914, and that at that date no demand for the balance had been made to the bank. The question seems to turn upon the terms of the contract made between banker and customer
C in ordinary course of business when a current account is opened by the bank. It is said on the one hand that it is a simple contract of loan; it is admitted that there is added, or superadded, an obligation of the bank to honour the customer's drafts to any amount not exceeding the credit balance at any material time; but it is contended that this added obligation does not affect the main contract. The bank has borrowed the money
D and is under the ordinary obligation of a borrower to repay. The lender can sue for his debt whenever he pleases. I am unable to accept this contention. I think that there is only one contract made between the bank and its customer. The terms of that contract involve obligations on both sides and require careful statement. They appear upon consideration to include the following provisions. The bank undertakes to receive money and to collect bills for its customer's account. The proceeds so received are not to be held in trust for the customer, but the bank borrows the proceeds
E and undertakes to repay them. The promise to repay is to repay at the branch of the bank where the account is kept, and during banking hours. It includes a promise to repay any part of the amount due against the written order of the customer addressed to the bank at the branch, and as such written orders may be outstanding in the ordinary course of F business for two or three days, it is a term of the contract that the bank will not cease to do business with the customer except upon reasonable notice. The customer on his part undertakes to exercise reasonable care in executing his written orders so as not to mislead the bank or to facilitate forgery. I think it is necessarily a term of such contract that the bank is not liable to pay the customer the full amount of his balance until he
G demands payment from the bank at the branch at which the current account is kept. Whether he must demand it in writing it is not necessary now to determine. The result I have mentioned seems to follow from the ordinary relations of banker and customer, but if it were necessary to fall back upon the course of business and the custom of bankers, I think that it was clearly established by undisputed evidence in this case that account except upon demand . . . The question appears to me to be in every case, did the parties in fact intend to make the demand a term of the contract? If they did, effect will be given to their contract, whether it be a direct promise to pay or a collateral promise, though in seeking to ascertain their intention the nature of the contract may be material. In the case of such a contract as this, if I have correctly stated the manifold terms of it, it appears to me that the parties must have intended that the money handed to the banker is only payable after a demand. The nature of the contract negatives the duty of the debtor to find out his creditor and pay him his debt. If such a duty existed and were performed, the creditor might be ruined by reason of outstanding cheques being dishonoured. Moreover, payment can only be due, as it appears to me, at the branch where the account is kept, and where the precise liabilities are known. And if this is so, I apprehend that demand at the place where alone the money is payable must be necessary. A decision to the contrary would subvert banking business. I am glad to think that, so far as I can ascertain, the decisions in the American courts are uniformly to the same effect as our present judgment."
H bankers never do make a payment to a customer in respect of a current

In Walker v. Bradford Old Bank, Ltd. (2) the court had to consider, on a Case Stated, the position which arose after the death of a customer who had assigned all moneys then or thereafter standing to his credit at the bank. It was held that the balance at the time of death was a debt or legal chose in action within the meaning of s. 25 (6) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and A. L. SMITH, J., who gave the judgment of the court, said (12 Q.B.D. 516):

"In the present case what has been assigned, to use the words of the indenture of assignment, is 'All moneys now or hereafter to be standing to the credit of the said Robert Vincent Reynolds' (the assignor) 'in the books of or at the said bank at Bradford, aforesaid, called the Bradford Old Bank, Ltd.' It was conceded in argument by the defendants that the moneys thereafter paid into the bank to the credit of the assignor were capable of being the subject-matter of contract: Holroyd v. Marshall (3), and I am of opinion that before and at the date of the assignment, and as long as the relation of customer and banker continued between the assignor and the bank, the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor existed between them (with the super-added obligation on the bank's part to honour the assignor's cheques, which is immaterial to the point under consideration), and that consequently there existed a contract on the bank's part to pay over on demand to the assignor all moneys then or thereafter standing to his credit. It seems to me, therefore, in this case, that at the date of the assignment there was an accruing debt arising out of contract, and consequently that this point also fails the defendants."

Clearly, the relationship of debtor and creditor exists between banker and customer on a current account though the right to sue does not arise in the ordinary case unless there has been a demand, and a demand at the branch at which the current account is situate. The relationship, so long as it exists, involves duties and obligations on both sides, and, consequently, intercourse between the customer and someone at the branch at which the account is kept. The case put forward by the plaintiffs on the appeal is that the contract was an executory contract and that it was frustrated by war, the defendants' Allenby Square branch being on one side of what was spoken of as the line of war and the plaintiffs being on the other side. It was said that as from May 15, 1948, there ceased to be any contract of current account between the plaintiffs and the defendants at the Allenby Square branch, and there was, therefore, no longer any money owing on current account, but by operation of law a new obligation arose, namely, an obligation on the defendants to refund the amount by which they had been unjustly enriched by frustration.

That obligation, it was said, was in the nature of a simple debt, situate at the place of residence of the debtor, i.e., at their head office in London. It was common ground that there is no difference between English, Palestinian, or Israeli law for the purposes of this appeal.

In support of their claim the plaintiffs relied on the speeches of their Lordships in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v. Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour, Ltd. (4). It is desirable that I should refer to some of those speeches. VISCOUNT SIMON,

A L.C., said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 125):

B “The principle is that where supervening events, not due to the default of either party, render the performance of a contract indefinitely impossible, and there is no undertaking to be bound in any event, frustration ensues, even though the parties may have expressly provided for the case of a limited interruption. As MACKINNON, L.J., points out, the unsoundness of the contrary view is implicit in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (5), for the charterparty in that case contained an exception of perils of the sea (see L.R. 8 C.P. 584), but none the less the contract was held to have been terminated and the adventure to have been frustrated by the long delay due to the stranding of the ship. The situation arising from the outbreak of the present war, so far as this country, Germany and Poland are concerned, makes applicable the well-known observation of LUSH, J., in Geipel v. Smith (6) (L.R. 7 Q.B. 414): ‘... a state of war [in that case the Franco-German war of 1870] must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants, as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this.’ There is a further reason for saying that this subsidiary contention of the appellants must fail, viz., that, while this country is at war with Germany and Germany is occupying Gdynia, a British subject such as the respondents could not lawfully make arrangements to deliver c.i.f. Gdynia and, therefore, the contract could not be further performed because of supervening illegality.”

E LORD ATKIN said (ibid., 130):

F “My Lords, for the reasons given by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., I agree that the appellant fails on all his points except that arising out of the frustration of the contract. I have no doubt that the contract in this case came to an end before the time for complete performance had arrived by reason of the arising of a state of war which caused an indefinite delay not contemplated by the parties, and eventually on account of the legal impossibility of delivering the goods at a port occupied by the enemy. In other words, to use a short phrase of frequent occurrence since the beginning of the last war, the commercial adventure was frustrated. The legal effects of ‘frustration’ are not in dispute. They were not determined for the first time either by the cases which arose on the postponement of the coronation of Edward VII, or by reason of the last war. It is very necessary to remember that, as pointed out by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Krell v. Henry (7) ([1903] 2 K.B. 748), the principle of law is the same whether the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of the existence of a thing which is the subject of the contract (an obligation de certo corpore) or by the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract and essential to its performance. It is well-settled that, when a contract which is still executory on one or both sides is subject to frustration, the law is that, when the event happens, the parties are excused from further performance, but have to give effect to rights under the contract already accrued before the happening of the event.”

LORD MACMILLAN said (ibid., 135):

"Owing to circumstances arising out of the present hostilities the contract has become impossible of fulfilment according to its terms. Neither party is to blame."

LORD WRIGHT said (ibid.):

"The claim in the action was to recover a prepayment of £1,000 made on account of the price under a contract which had been frustrated. The claim was for money paid for a consideration which had failed. It is clear that any civilised system of law is bound to provide remedies for cases of what has been called unjust enrichment or unjust benefit, that is, to prevent a man from retaining the money of, or some benefit derived from, another which it is against conscience that he should keep. Such remedies in English law are generically different from remedies in contract or in tort, and are now recognised to fall within a third category of the common law which has been called quasi-contract or restitution. The root idea was stated by three Lords of Appeal, LORD SHAW, LORD SUMNER and LORD CARSON, in R. E. Jones, Ltd. v. Waring & Gillow, Ltd. (8), which dealt with a particular species of the category, namely, money paid under a mistake of fact. LORD SUMNER, referring to Kelly v. Solari (9), where money had been paid by an insurance company under the mistaken impression that it was due to an executrix under a policy which had in fact been cancelled, said ([1926] A.C. 696): 'There was no real intention on the company's part to enrich her.' Payment under a mistake of fact is only one head of this category of the law. Another class is where, as in this case, there is prepayment on account of money to be paid as consideration for the performance of a contract which in the event becomes abortive and is not performed, so that the money never becomes due. There was in such circumstances no intention to enrich the payee. This is the class of claims for the recovery of money paid for a consideration which has failed. Such causes of action have long been familiar and were assumed to be commonplace by HOLT, C.J., in Holmes v. Hall (10) [in 1704]. HOLT, C.J., was there concerned only about the proper form of action and took the cause of action as beyond question. He says (Holt K.B. 36): 'If A give money to B to pay to C upon C's giving writings, etc., and C will not do it, indebit will lie for A against B for so much money received to his use. And many such actions have been maintained for earnest in bargains, when the bargainer would not perform, and for premiums for insurance, when the ship, etc., did not go the voyage.' HOLT, C.J., is there using earnest as meaning a prepayment on account of the price, not in the modern sense of an irrevocable payment to bind the bargain; and he is recognising that the indebitatus assumpsit had by that time been accepted as the appropriate form of action in place of the procedure which had been used in earlier times to enforce these claims such as debt, account or case. By 1760 actions for money had and received had increased in number and variety. LORD MANSFIELD, in a familiar passage in Moses v. Macferlan (11), sought to rationalise the action for money had and received, and illustrates it by some typical instances. He said (2 Burr. 1012): 'It lies for money paid by mistake; or upon a consideration which happens to fail; or for money got through imposition (express, or implied); or extortion; or oppression; or an undue advantage taken of the plaintiff's situation, contrary to laws made for the protection of persons under those circumstances. In one word the gist of this kind of action is, that the defendant, upon the circumstances of the case, is obliged by the ties of natural justice and equity to refund the money.' LORD MANSFIELD pre-faced this pronouncement by observations (ibid., 1008) which are to be noted: 'If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund; the law implies a debt, and gives this action [sc. indebitatus assumpsit] founded in the equity of the plaintiff's case, as it were, upon a contract ("quasi ex contractu" as the Roman law expresses it).' LORD MANSFIELD does not say that the law implies a promise. The law implies a debt or obligation which is a different thing. In fact he denies that there is a contract. The obligation is as efficacious as if it were upon a contract. The obligation is a creation of the law, just as much as an obligation in tort. The obligation belongs to a third class, distinct from either contract or tort, though it resembles contract rather than tort . . . The gist of the action is a debt or obligation implied or more accurately imposed by law, in much the same way as the law enforces as a debt the obligation to pay a statutory or customary impost."

LORD WRIGHT cited ([1942] 2 All E.R. 138) the views of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in Royal Bank of Canada v. Regem (12), where the Lord Chancellor said ([1913] A.C. 296):

"It is a well-established principle of the English common law that when money has been received by one person which in justice and equity belongs to another, under circumstances which render the receipt of it a receipt by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff, the latter may recover as for money had and received to his use."

In the Fibrosa case (4) LORD ROCHE used these words ([1942] 2 All E.R. 142):

"I have no doubt that this case is one of frustration of the contract and falls within the doctrine applicable to such cases. An alternative case made by the appellants that the contract was merely suspended and whilst suspended was repudiated by the respondents is, I think, without foundation."

LORD PORTER said (ibid., 144):

"What has been said is that the doctrine of frustration depends upon the implication of an implied term. Reasonable persons, it is said, would not have had in mind the event which befell, but, if they had, they would have unhesitatingly said, 'In that event all further obligation of performance on either side is at an end.' So far and no further it is acknowledged the law of this country has gone. It is, however, urged that a system of jurisprudence which is astute enough to devise such a term is capable of adding to it the proviso that in such a case some equitable proportion of any sum paid in advance shall be recoverable when the contract becomes impossible of performance."

In Schering, Ltd. v. Stockholms Enskilda Bank Aktiebolag (13), a German company having incurred a debt to a Swedish bank the payment of which was suspended for eight years, an English company, which was a subsidiary of the German company, entered into a contract with the bank whereby the English company undertook to pay the debt by half-yearly instalments over a period of eight years, at the same time acquiring the right to an assignment of the bank's rights against the German company. The chief question was whether the contract was to be regarded as an executory or as an executed contract, and the House of Lords by a majority decided that, on the true construction of the documents, the respondent bank, having fully performed its obligations to the German company before the outbreak of war, nothing remained to be done under the contract, which was one between an English company and a neutral, but to discharge an accrued debt by instalments, and, accordingly, since war did not abrogate or discharge a debt incurred before the declaration, the obligation to pay and the right to recover were only suspended. LORD THANKERTON said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 39):

" . . . we had a very full citation of authorities and the able arguments of counsel on both sides have been very helpful, but I find little need to go beyond the speeches of LORD DUNEDIN and LORD SUMNER in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14), in which the earlier authorities are reviewed. LORD DUNEDIN ([1918] A.C. 274) says: 'From these cases I draw the conclusion that upon the ground of public policy the continued existence of contractual relation between subjects and alien enemies or persons voluntarily residing in the enemy country which (1) gives opportunities for the conveyance of information which may hurt the conduct of the war, or (2) may tend to increase the resources of the enemy or cripple the resources of the King's subjects, is obnoxious and prohibited by our law.' In his judgment LORD GREENE, M.R., appears to draw a distinction, on matter of principle, between contracts between a British subject and an alien enemy, and a contract between a British subject and a neutral. In my opinion, the paramount consideration of public policy in either case is the unhampered carrying on of the war, without harmful intercourse with the enemy, or economic benefit to the enemy or economic disadvantage to this country. But the applicability of the principle is likely to be rare in the case of contracts between a British subject and a neutral, or not so obvious as in the case of a contract between a British subject and an enemy. As regards the consequence of this contravention of public policy, I am of opinion that the courts have no choice between the abrogation and suspension of the contract, abrogation being the necessary consequence. I agree with LORD SUMNER's statement on this point in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14) ([1918] A.C. 286): 'My Lords, if upon public grounds on the outbreak of war the law interferes with private executory contracts by dissolving them, how can it be open to a subject for his private advantage to withdraw his contract from the operation of the law and to claim to do what the law rejects, merely to suspend where the law dissolves? The prohibition, which arises at common law on the outbreak of war, has for this purpose the effect of a statute. The choice between suspending and discharging the contract on the outbreak of war was quite deliberately made, and if occasionally the contract is said to be only suspended, or a court refuses to dispose of a case on the ground of dissolution alone, this only brings into relief the fact that by an overwhelming preponderance of authority such trading contracts have been held to be dissolved on the outbreak of war. An appearance of authority to the contrary is sometimes found to be in truth a misreading of the language of a decision.' After reference, by way of illustration, to the language of LORD HALSBURY ([1902] A.C. 493), in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (15), LORD SUMNER proceeded ([1918] A.C. 287): 'There can be no doubt that the matter must have been considered. To many people suspension seems to have much to recommend it. Freedom of contract is challenged less; the sacrosanctity of commerce is respected more. The courts could not have adopted the rule of dissolution unless they had reasoned that suspension would be inconsistent with this principle of the law of contract. I will quote the language of WILLES, J., in Esposito v. Bowden (16) (7 E. & B. 792): "In all ordinary cases, the more convenient course for both parties seems to be that both should be at once absolved, so that each, on becoming aware of the fact of a war, the end of which cannot be foreseen, making the voyage or the shipment presumably illegal for an indefinite period, may at once be at liberty to engage in another adventure without waiting for the bare possibility of the war coming to an end in sufficient time to allow of the contract being fulfilled, or some other opportunity of lawfully performing the contract perchance arising. The law upon this subject was doubtless made, according to the well-known rule, to meet cases of ordinary occurrence." To his

A mind I think it is clear that the rule was one made to provide certainty at the outbreak of war, where in itself everything is uncertain; that it was one made to apply generally, although taking its form from the needs of ordinary cases; and that, for the purpose of applying it, the case must be looked at as things stood when war broke out, and not as they were ascertained to be or as they ultimately happened during the interval before the trial of the action.' The contracts which fall under this principle of public policy are clearly contracts the performance or further performance of which after the outbreak of war may involve the consequences which the principle, by its application, seeks to avoid, but it is equally clear that there are certain well established exceptions to the contracts thus broadly defined. I may quote the speech of LORD DUNEDIN in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14) ([1918] A.C. 269): 'Now Esposito v. Bowden (16) has been cited by learned judges in many cases, and no doubt has ever been cast on its authority. Nor has it ever been taken as dealing with any particular contract, but it has been held as dealing with contracts in general. So far as Janson's case (15) is concerned, the only matter there decided was that there must be an actual state of war to determine a contract; a mere imminence of war is not enough. It is true that LORD HALSBURY'S dictum, if applied as an universal proposition, would be counter to the doctrine of Esposito v. Bowden (16). But I am satisfied not only that the dictum was obiter and not binding, but that LORD HALSBURY was not dealing with or thinking of executory contracts, but of contracts under which rights had already accrued. There is indeed no such general proposition as that a state of war avoids all contracts between subjects and enemies. Accrued rights are not affected though the right of suing in respect thereof is suspended. Further, there are certain contracts, particularly those which are really the concomitants of rights of property, which even so far as executory are not abrogated. Such as, for instance, the contract between landlord and tenant, of which an example may be found in the recent case of Halsey v. Lowenfeld (17). In other words, the executory contract which is abrogated must either involve intercourse, or its continued existence must be in some way against public policy as that has been laid down in decided cases.' In the case of the established exceptions to which LORD DUNEDIN refers the necessity for intercourse with an enemy is obviated by the postponement of the right of action, and non-forfeiture of an existing right supersedes any question of an immediate or future benefit to the enemy."

LORD THANKERTON approved words of SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR which appear to me to be of great importance and to be helpful in the solution of this case. The learned Law Lord said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 41):

G "I am inclined to agree with SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR'S suggestion (LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR (1944), 2nd ed., at p. 93) that the distinction between 'executed' and 'executory contracts' may not be very helpful in this connection, and that it may be safer to say that the effect of the outbreak of war upon contracts legally affected by it is to abrogate or destroy any subsisting right to further performance other than the right to the payment of a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt and will survive the outbreak of war."

H Later in his speech LORD THANKERTON said (ibid.):

"It is important to make clear that the principle of abrogation does not involve destruction of the contract so far as already performed. That which is abrogated is the further performance of the contract, as from the outbreak of war; or, as LORD DUNEDIN expresses it in the passage already quoted, the continued existence of the contractual relationship is prohibited."

I draw attention to the fact that the citation from LORD DUNEDIN is not quite accurate.

In the same case (the Schering case (13)), LORD PORTER said (ibid., 48):

"My Lords, I have found the solution of this case a matter of difficulty, primarily, I think, because of the complexity of the arrangements between the parties and the necessity of safeguarding the rights of neutrals whilst not diminishing the ability of this country to preserve its interests in time of war. It is, no doubt, generally true that the further performance of contracts made before the outbreak of war and not fully performed on either side is prohibited as contrary to public policy provided that such performance involves intercourse with an enemy or benefits him. For the sake of brevity I speak of this result as abrogation of the contract though the contract itself is not abrogated, but further performance alone forbidden. There are, however, exceptions and limitations upon this doctrine. So far, at any rate, as concerns benefit to the enemy, the further performance of contracts which have been completely performed on one side and in which all that remains is payment by the other are suspended, not dissolved, and in the same category are to be placed certain contracts, particularly those which are really concomitants of the rights of property though still executory: see per LORD DUNEDIN in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14) ([1918] A.C. 269). In each case, therefore, before deciding whether a contract is abrogated or merely suspended on the outbreak of war it is essential to determine its exact construction and effect."

In his speech (ibid., 56), LORD GODDARD cited the words of LORD DUNEDIN ([1928] A.C. 276) in Ottoman Bank v. Jebara (18):

"... it is not every contract that is abrogated by . . . war; it is only a contract which is still executory and which for its execution requires [I emphasise that word] intercourse between the English subject and the enemy."

In Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. v. Imperial Smelting Corpn., Ltd. (19), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., said ([1941] 2 All E.R. 171):

"In this connection, it is well to emphasise that, when 'frustration' in the legal sense occurs, it does not merely provide one party with a defence in an action brought by the other. It kills the contract itself and discharges both parties automatically. The plaintiff sues for breach at a past date and the defendant pleads that at that date no contract existed. In this situation, the plaintiff could only succeed if it were shown that the determination of the contract were due to the defendant's 'default', and it would be a strange result if the party alleging this were not the party required to prove it. The doctrine of discharge from liability by frustration has been explained in various ways, sometimes by speaking of the disappearance of a foundation which the parties assumed to be at the basis of their contract, sometimes as deduced from a rule arising from impossibility of performance, and sometimes as flowing from the inference of an implied term. Whichever way it is put, the legal consequence is the same. The most satisfactory basis, I think, upon which the doctrine can be put is that it depends on an implied term in the contract of the parties."

The Lord Chancellor then drew attention to the difference between discharge by supervening impossibility and discharge by supervening illegality. Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14) is of importance, and I refer, in particular, to passages from the speech of LORD SUMNER ([1918] A.C. 285, 287, 288 and 289). These authorities were relied on by the plaintiffs in support of their claim that the contract of current account was abrogated by war: it became illegal to perform it. And it was said that there was no debt due at the time, no accrued liability, for there had been no demand, and no demand could be made at the Allenby Square branch after the expiration of the mandate, and thus it was claimed that there arose on the defendants an obligation to pay the amount then standing to the credit of the plaintiffs on the principle stated by LORD WRIGHT ([1942] 2 All E.R. 135, 136) in the Fibrosa case (4). The defendants had not sought at the trial to establish any custom or called any evidence as to banking practice, but our attention was drawn to the way in which the money of an enemy in a current account was dealt with in this country.

A Under the powers given by the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 7, the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1198, as amended) was made, and art. 1 of that order is in these terms:

"(i) Any money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy, and any money which is to be deemed for the purposes of the Act to be money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be so payable, shall be paid to the Custodian. (ii) Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing paragraph, there shall be paid to the Custodian in particular any money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy, by way of . . . (e) debt, including money in the possession of any bankers, whether on deposit or current account or whether held in trust or in custody for or for the benefit of an enemy."

It was illegal to make payments to an enemy, and specific provision was made that any balance on the current account of an enemy should be paid to the Custodian.

D Counsel for the defendants submitted that the true doctrine as to the effect of war is not that it abrogates and destroys the contract itself, but that, subject to certain exceptions, it prohibits the further performance of a contract other than the right to a liquidated sum of money which will, whether strictly already a debt or not, be treated as a debt, the right to payment being suspended. I am not sure that this is completely in accord with the view expressed by LORD SUMNER in the Ertel Bieber case (14). In Bagley v. Winsome (National Provincial Bank, Ltd., Garnishee) (20), SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., referred ([1952] 1 All E.R. 639) to the fact that it has for a long time been well established (and it is common practice) that garnishee proceedings are available in the case of a current account with a banker, and that that was recognised by all three lords justices in Joachimson's case (1). Under R.S.C., F Ord. 45, r. 1, this form of attachment applies in the case of "debts owing or accruing". In the case of the current account with which we are immediately concerned, the debt was not "accruing". It was a debt "owing", though so long as the account was "current" it could not be recovered by action until there had been a demand.

G The conclusion at which I have arrived on consideration of the authorities is that on the expiration of the mandate the contract of current account was abrogated. There remained a sum of money to the credit of the plaintiffs. With the abrogation of the contract there went the necessity for a demand. That was a necessary element in a current account, but no more. The relationship of debtor and creditor remained, but the super-added obligations which go with the relationship in regard to a current account had gone, and H the amount to the credit of the customer remained theoretically at the Allenby Square branch. By reason of the existence of war payment was suspended. That is how I regard the position. And in support of that view I refer again to the words of LORD THANKERTON ([1946] 1 All E.R. 41) in Schering's case (13). I have already read them, and I do so again. He said:

"I am inclined to agree with SIR ARNOLD McNAIR's suggestion (LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR (1944), 2nd ed., at p. 93), that the distinction between 'executed' and 'executory contracts' may not be very helpful in this connection, and that it may be safer to say that the effect of the outbreak of war upon contracts legally affected by it is to abrogate or destroy any subsisting right to further performance other than the right to the payment of a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt and will survive the outbreak of war."

PARKER, J., based his decision on those words taken from the work of SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR, and, having regard to what I consider was the adoption of them by LORD THANKERTON, I think that he was right in so doing. The effect of the outbreak of war on this contract of current account was to

" . . . abrogate or destroy any subsisting right to further performance other than the right to the payment of a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt and will survive the outbreak of war."

The payment of the debt was suspended, and in due course under Israeli law the amount was collected by the Custodian appointed in accordance with the law of that country.

A further point taken on behalf of the defendants was that, if the contract was frustrated, one cannot substitute an obligation which will enrich the enemy in just the same way—and that is what would happen if it was held that the amount was payable to the plaintiffs in England. The submission was put in this way:

" If contrary to the [defendants'] submission the present contract and all rights and obligations under it are to be considered as abrogated it is only because the law of Israel treats the contract as illegal—but it is no part of the law of Israel, or of England, that a person who is by that law forbidden to perform a contract for the payment of money to an enemy alien is simultaneously placed under a present or any obligation of law to pay the money otherwise due on the contract as money had and received or as unjust enrichment. Any such rule would immediately defeat the purpose of the primary rule from which it was said to result and which had abrogated the obligation in favour of the enemy. Moreover, such new obligation would not have occurred before the war and would itself have been abrogated by the very principles on which the [plaintiffs] rely."

I do not see any answer to this point. If there was frustration, but, notwithstanding that, an obligation was created under which the defendants were bound to pay at another place those who were enemies of Israel, the result would, in effect, be the same as though the balance was paid direct. It is impossible to conceive that the law of any country would create such an obligation. For the reasons which I have given, I feel that the appeal must fail. I reach that conclusion with some regret, for this appears to be a hard case, but that is not the fault of the courts of this country. It is one of the results of war.

JENKINS, L.J., stated the facts, and said: The appeal falls to be determined on the footing that at the moment of the termination of the mandate the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants under which the plaintiffs' current account was kept at the defendants' Allenby Square branch was a subsisting contract of which there had been no breach or repudiation by the defendants, and by virtue of which the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid by the defendants at their Allenby Square branch the amount of the balance there standing to the credit of the plaintiffs' current account on making a demand to that branch for such payment. On this footing it seems to me to be plain, and, indeed, it is not disputed, that, if the termination of the mandate had been followed by the constitution, without any war, of the State of Israel, and if the plaintiffs' current account had continued to be kept, as before, at the defendants' Allenby Square branch down to the passing of the Israeli regulations relating to the property of absentees, the plaintiffs' credit balance would have vested in the Custodian and the payment of it to him by the defendants would have operated as an effective discharge to the defendants for the amount so paid. In this hypothetical state of facts the plaintiffs would, admittedly, have been absentees within the meaning of the regulations, and the credit balance on their current account with the defendants' Allenby Square branch, payable as it was at, and on demand made to, that branch, and, therefore, within the area to which the law of the State of Israel applied, would clearly have been property situated in that area in the form of a debt or an indebtedness to the "absentee" plaintiffs within the meaning of the regulations.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that the legal effect on the contract between the plaintiffs and defendants under which the plaintiffs' current account was kept at the defendants' Allenby Square branch, and on the balance standing to the credit of the plaintiffs in that account, of the war which, contemporaneously with the termination of the mandate, broke out between the Jews and the Arabs was such as to prevent this result. The argument begins with the proposition, which is not in dispute, that the contract, and the balance standing to the plaintiffs' credit under the contract, became on the outbreak of war subject to the law of Israel in regard to trading with the enemy inasmuch as the contract was a contract between persons, i.e., the defendants, carrying on business in Israeli territory and persons, i.e., the plaintiffs, residing and carrying on business in Arab territory (and, therefore, enemies of Israel) which involved payment of money by the former to the latter at a place in Israeli territory, i.e., the defendants' Allenby Square branch, on demand made by the latter to the former at that place. The next proposition, also undisputed, is that the law of Israel in regard to trading with the enemy (apart from any local legislation) is the same as the common law of England.

The common law of England in this regard is thus stated by LORD DUNEDIN ([1918] A.C. 267) in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14):

"My Lords, the proposition of law on which the judgment of the courts is based is that a state of war between this kingdom and another country abrogates and puts an end to all executory contracts which for their further performance require, as it is often phrased, commercial intercourse between the one contracting party, subject of the King, and the other contracting party, an alien enemy, or anyone voluntarily residing in the enemy country. I use the expression 'often phrased commercial intercourse' because I think the word 'intercourse' is sufficient without the epithet 'commercial'. As to this I agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Robson v. Premier Oil & Pipe Line Co., Ltd. (21), where PICKFORD, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., himself and WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1915] 2 Ch. 136): 'The prohibition of intercourse with alien enemies rests upon public policy, and we can see no ground either on principle or authority for holding that a transaction between an alien enemy and a British subject which might result in detriment to this country or advantage to the enemy is permissible because it cannot be brought within the definition of a commercial transaction.' That so expressed it is an incontrovertible proposition admits, I think, upon the authorities, of no doubt."

There are, however, certain exceptions to the general rule. Thus, in the same speech, LORD DUNEDIN said (ibid., 269):

"There is indeed no such general proposition as that a state of war avoids all contracts between subjects and enemies. Accrued rights are not affected though the right of suing in respect thereof is suspended. Further, there are certain contracts, particularly those which are really the concomitants of rights of property, which even so far as executory are not abrogated. Such as, for instance, the contract between landlord and tenant, of which an example may be found in the recent case of Halsey

v. Lowenfeld (17). In other words, the executory contract which is abrogated must either involve intercourse, or its continued existence must be in some other way against public policy as that has been laid down in decided cases."

LORD SUMNER, in the same case, in a passage directed against the contention that a clause providing for the suspension of a contract in the event of war could displace the absolute abrogation which the law requires, said (ibid., 289):

"The whole contract so far as it is mutually executory is dissolved. Again, the suspension of the right of suit in the case of enemy nationals, for causes of action already accrued, until the conclusion of peace, is not an argument in favour of substituting suspension by agreement for discharge by operation of law. Whether it sounds in debt or in damages such a cause of action implies a present obligation to pay simultaneous with its coming into existence. Suspension of the remedy implies no continuance of the contract during the war, but only a recognition of its existence before the war as the basis or origin of a right, which, when it has accrued, is a chose in action, a form of property."

The point in issue at this stage of the present case is whether the plaintiffs' right to payment on demand of the balance standing to the credit of their current account was within the exception from the general rule of abrogation accorded to accrued rights. Counsel for the plaintiffs admitted that, if the plaintiffs' right to the credit balance was an accrued right within the meaning of the exception, the appeal must fail, for on that view the legal effect of the war was not to abrogate it but merely to suspend its enforcement, in which case the credit balance remained in being after the outbreak of war as a debt owing in the State of Israel from the defendants to the plaintiffs, and, accordingly, vested in the Israeli Custodian and was properly paid to him by the defendants. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, submitted that the credit balance was not such an accrued right. According to him it was merely an incident of a wholly executory contract between the defendants, as bankers, and the plaintiffs, as current-account customers, under which the defendants undertook to perform banking services for the plaintiffs, and to pay on demand to the plaintiffs, or as they should direct, the whole or any part of the balance from time to time standing to the credit of the account, in return for the use of such balance allowed to them by the plaintiffs. This contract, said counsel, necessarily involved intercourse between the defendants and the enemy plaintiffs and, therefore, was wholly abrogated by the outbreak of war, such abrogation extending to the credit balance itself. Further, he said that, as a demand was necessary before the plaintiffs could sue for the amount of the balance (see Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (1)), the plaintiffs' right to it was not an accrued right within the meaning of the exception, which extended only to rights immediately enforceable by action either at or before the outbreak of war or on some then pre-determined future date, and not to rights in respect of which a step involving intercourse with the enemy (such as a demand by the enemy for payment) was a necessary preliminary to suit. His submission, as I understood it, even went so far as to say, in effect, that unless and until the plaintiffs made a demand for payment the credit balance was not a debt owing to, or in the nature of property owned by, the plaintiffs.

I cannot accept this argument. It seems to me to confound the further performance of the contract, which was clearly abrogated, with the indebtedness of the defendants to the plaintiffs on the current account which had in fact resulted from the operation of the contract down to the outbreak of war, and did not depend for its existence on any further performance of the contract after such outbreak. It seems to me impossible to dispute that, if a demand for payment had been made the instant before the outbreak of war, and if, while (so to speak) the manager of the defendants' Jerusalem branch was turning towards the safe to get out the money, war had broken out and prevented the payment being made, the credit balance would have constituted an accrued right within the meaning of the exception. This part of the plaintiffs' case, therefore, resolves itself into the narrow question whether the necessity for a demand before action to enforce payment prevented the credit balance from being such an accrued right. I cannot think that it did. Clearly, no effective demand for payment could be made during the war, but, for that matter, nor could any effective action be brought to enforce payment during the war, nor could payment without action brought be lawfully made during the war. Of these three disabilities the second and third apply equally to a debt payable without any demand, which, clearly, would not be abrogated but only be suspended in point of enforcement for the duration of the war, and I fail to see why the presence of the first, i.e., inability to make an effective demand in the case of a debt payable on demand, should bring about cancellation as distinct from suspension. The making of a demand in respect of a debt payable on demand is a step which (war apart) the creditor is free to take when he chooses. It is an assertion of a title, or proprietary right, already perfected by the lending of the money on terms that it is to be repaid on demand, and not an act by virtue of which the debt is brought into being. In my view, it is not open to doubt that a debt payable on demand such as a credit balance on a current account is property assignable by the creditor and passing under his will or intestacy. It is property in the shape of a debt or chose in action of a particular kind, i.e., a debt payable on demand, which by the terms of the contract of loan has to be got in, or reduced into possession, in a particular way, i.e., by making a demand for payment. It may be asked how the necessity for a demand, imposed as it is by the contract, can survive the abrogation of the contract's further performance. For my part, I think the necessity for a demand should probably be regarded as surviving the abrogation of the further performance of the contract, not by virtue of the contract itself, which has gone, but as a characteristic, in the nature of a restriction on its recovery, inherent in the debt contracted as a result of the past operation of the contract. An alternative view, expressed by SINGLETON, L.J., is to the effect that the abrogation of the further performance of the contract does away with the necessity for a demand, so that in the present case the position would be that at the outbreak of war the plaintiffs were left simply with a credit balance at the defendants' Allenby Square branch payable without demand. This alternative would clearly be destructive of the plaintiffs' case. But, speaking for myself, I prefer the other alternative, and am content to assume that the necessity for a demand survived the outbreak of war just as a debt owing at the outbreak of war, and by virtue of the contract payable on a specified future date, would (though suspended in point of enforcement) survive as a debt payable on that date, and not be converted into a debt payable forthwith. There is no authority directly in point, in the sense of a decision whether a credit balance on current account payable on demand is or is not an accrued right within the meaning of the exception, but I think strong support for the view that it should be so considered is to be found in Schering, Ltd. v. Stockholms Enskilda Bank Aktiebolag (13). In particular, I would refer to the following passage from the speech of LORD THANKERTON ([1946] 1 All E.R. 41):

"I am inclined to agree with SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR's suggestion (LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR (1944), 2nd ed., at p. 93), that the distinction between 'executed' and 'executory contracts' may not be very helpful in this connection, and that it may be safer to say that the effect of the outbreak of war upon contracts legally affected by it is to abrogate or destroy any subsisting right to further performance other than the right to the payment of a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt and will survive the outbreak of war. In this view, I proceed to consider what is included in the phrase 'a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt.' The appellants' counsel admitted that a debt payable by instalments would be so included, and that provision for discount on anticipation of the instalment dates would not alter the position, nor would express provision for the acknowledgment in writing of each sum paid affect the matter. In my opinion the fact that the creditor held security for the payment of the debt, which would fall to be restored to the debtor on payment of the debt, would make no difference even though the security had been absolutely assigned to the creditor, and would require retransfer to the debtor. In my opinion, the present case only raises one further point, viz., the fact that the appellants were bound as principals to the respondents to discharge the debt in respect of which the German company were the original principal debtors, and were, therefore, entitled under the April contract on payment to the respondents of each instalment, to an assignment by the latter of a like sterling amount of their claim against the German company. My Lords, I cannot think that this makes any difference to the position. The appellants, under the April contract, were bound to discharge the whole debt within a period which would terminate before the lapse of the eight years, when the liability of the German company to make any payment towards the debt would first arise; in other words, the appellants were bound to acquire the debt, and their being placed by assignment in the shoes of the respondents is merely incidental to the discharge of the debt owed to the respondents and is not different in substance from the case of the return of securities to which I have already referred. It is important to make clear that the principle of abrogation does not involve destruction of the contract so far as already performed. That which is abrogated is the further performance of the contract, as from the outbreak of war; or, as LORD DUNEDIN expresses it in the passage already quoted, the continued existence of the contractual relationship is prohibited . . . It seems clear to me that this reservation included matters involving intercourse with the enemy, but, as LORD DUNEDIN points out, the right of action is postponed. It seems equally clear it might involve substantial economic benefit to the enemy. The declaration of SIMONDS, J., contains no such reservation, and the result, in my opinion, is to confiscate the right of debt, which had arisen to the respondents on the delivery of the Reichsmarks on Apr. 28, 1936. I am not aware of any precedent for such confiscation, and it is clearly not justified under the decision of this House in the Ertel Bieber case (14). Indeed, it is inconsistent with it. I may add that in Esposito v. Bowden (16), the performance of the contract had not commenced prior to the outbreak of war."

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, who dissented, but to this extent agreed with the majority, said (ibid., 45):

"Thus a contract which is completely executed on one side, and under which nothing remains to be performed except payment to be made by the other of a liquidated sum whether already due, or debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro, is unaffected by the outbreak of war. The payment cannot in fact take place between enemies in war time; so long as the war lasts the payment is suspended. Nor is enemy property confiscated at common law by the outbreak of war, and consequently contractual rights and obligations incidental to the ownership of property are not put an end to at common law by the outbreak of war. The enforcement of them during the war may be impossible, but they will survive the war."

LORD GODDARD said (ibid., 57):

"It is beyond question that if the result of performance of a contract would be beneficial to the enemy or detrimental to this country the further performance is forbidden and the contract abrogated, though again rights, such as debts, accrued before the war are unaffected. This is illustrated by the order in the Ertel Bieber case (14) made by the Court of Appeal and affirmed in this House and which your Lordships have seen in the printed book. Now one of the reasons why a suspensory clause to operate in the event of war in a contract for the sale of goods to an enemy will not save the performance of the contract from abrogation as illegal is that to ensure to an enemy a supply of goods or raw material after the war is or may be to enhance his resources during the war. If this consideration were taken to its full logical extent it might be said to apply to debts, as it would certainly be of some benefit to an enemy to have an English debt remaining due to him even though it is not payable until the end of the war. He might be able to raise money from neutrals upon an assignment of his rights which could be enforced at the conclusion of the war. But this doctrine never has been applied to debts arising out of previous contracts, and I am not prepared now for the first time to apply it and to hold that accrued causes of action are destroyed and not suspended because otherwise an enemy might obtain a discount or some other benefit by reason of the continued existence of the obligation."

If, as was recognised in the Schering case (13), a debt contracted before the outbreak of war, but made payable by instalments on dates occurring after such outbreak, is not abrogated by such outbreak but merely suspended as regards enforcement, and this notwithstanding the right of the debtor to an acknowledgment, and transfer of a security, on the payment of each instalment, I fail to see why it should be held that a debt contracted before the outbreak of war should be cancelled merely because it is payable on demand. By parity of reasoning, a credit balance kept by an enemy with a bank in this country on terms that it was to be payable against production of a passbook or deposit receipt would be cancelled by the outbreak of war. Once the exception of accrued rights is accepted, and once the basis of it, viz., that the law in its concern to prevent benefit to enemies does not go to the length of confiscating enemy property, is recognised, I see no reason in principle or common sense why a debt, for the recovery of which some formality, such as a demand for payment or the production of some indicia of title, is made requisite, should on that ground be excluded from the benefit of the exception. This would, indeed, be nothing more or less than the very confiscation of proprietary rights which the law declines to countenance. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' credit balance in this case was not cancelled by the outbreak of war, but remained in existence subject to the suspension for the duration of the war of the plaintiffs' right to recover it. On this aspect of the case I find myself in complete agreement with the reasoning and conclusions of the learned judge, and, in particular, I would record my approval of the observation which he quotes from SIR ARNOLD MCNAIR'S LEGAL EFFECTS OF WAR, 3rd ed. (1948), at p. 121:

"It is inconceivable that upon the outbreak of war an English banker's obligation towards an enemy customer is ipso facto destroyed."

It follows that, in my opinion, the appeal must fail. This makes it unnecessary for me to consider at length the second stage in the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs, which was to the effect that the cancellation of the credit balance gave rise to a right in the plaintiffs to recover a like amount from the defendants as money had and received, or, alternatively, on the ground that the defendants were "unjustly enriched" to that extent by the cancellation of their contractual indebtedness. This argument is founded on Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v. Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour, Ltd. (4). But even if, contrary to my opinion, the plaintiffs' credit balance was cancelled by the outbreak of war because it was not an accrued right, but part and parcel of an executory contract the further performance of which was rendered unlawful by the outbreak of war, and, therefore, abrogated, I am by no means satisfied that the principle of that case would give the plaintiffs the substituted non-contractual right which they claim. If a trader (say in Germany) agrees to buy from another trader (say in Britain) goods for which he pays in advance, and before the goods are supplied war breaks out between Britain and Germany, further performance of the contract is abrogated and the British trader is for ever absolved from supplying the goods. Indeed, it would be illegal for him to do so. But, as I understand the principle, the German trader, by virtue of the payment made by him of the price of the goods before the outbreak of war, has from the instant of the outbreak of war a right to repayment of the money, as money paid for a consideration which has wholly failed, arising contemporaneously with the abrogation of the further performance of the contract. This seems to me to be a species of accrued right which, though suspended in point of enforcement during the war, is not abrogated. The law does not say to the German: "You shall have the goods after the war". It says: "Because you cannot have the goods, you shall have back after the war the money you paid before the war as the price of the goods which the war prevented you from receiving." But in the present case the contract, which, according to the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs, is abrogated, is a contract to repay on demand money lent, and the outbreak of war has made it illegal for the debtor to repay that money. I fail to see how in those circumstances the law can sensibly say to the debtor: "You must not pay this debt. It would be illegal for you to do so. The debt is, therefore, cancelled, and not merely suspended, because anything short of cancellation would aid the enemy. Nevertheless, it would be unconscionable in you not to pay the debt, which on grounds of public policy you are forbidden to pay, and you are, therefore, enjoined to pay a like amount to your enemy creditor, and to do that without any such demand or other formality as was required of him in relation to the recovery of the contractual debt which has been cancelled. Your obligation to make this payment will, however, be suspended during the war." This seems to me to be no more than a roundabout way of saying that the debt is not cancelled, but that the right to recover it is merely suspended for the duration of the war, the only difference between the contractual and non-contractual obligations being that, in so far as the need for a demand is dispensed with, the substituted obligation is more onerous to the Briton and more advantageous to the enemy German than the original obligation which, to prevent benefit to the enemy, the law was at pains to extinguish.

In a case in which the debtor was a British banker residing and carrying on business in England alone, and the creditor was an enemy German, the law, as counsel for the plaintiffs presents it, would be futile, to say the least. But the whole object of the two stages of his argument turns on the circumstances that in the present case the defendants carry on business in the belligerent country concerned, i.e., Israel, only through a branch, their place, or principal place, of residence being in England. In these circumstances counsel's preoccupation is to kill the contractual debt and its localisation in Israel, and resuscitate from its ashes a claim for the same amount in a new guise in which it becomes a claim against the defendants simpliciter, as distinct from a claim against the defendants at their Jerusalem branch. In this form, according to counsel, the claim can be pursued in England against the defendants as resident here, and, not being situated in Israel, it could not be caught by the Israeli regulations concerning the property of absentees, or be suspended in point of enforcement during the Israeli-Arab war. In such circumstances the law, as counsel for the plaintiffs presents it, would have the most extraordinary consequences, Suppose a Swiss bank with a branch in London. Suppose a German has a credit balance on a current account kept by him with the London branch of the Swiss bank. Suppose a war breaks out between Britain and Germany, Switzerland remaining neutral. According to the theory of counsel for the plaintiffs, English law, to prevent benefit to the enemy, cancels the German's credit balance at the Swiss bank's branch in London, and at the same time presents the German enemy with an immediate right to recover the amount of the credit balance by suing the Swiss bank in Switzerland. This seems to me to involve a complete stultification of the common law in regard to trading with the enemy, and a complete negation of the considerations of public policy on which it is based. An interesting argument was presented to us as to the local situation of the resuscitated claim, supposing such a claim to exist. As to that, I need only say that the claim, as formulated by counsel for the plaintiffs, was by definition situated outside Israel. But if the cancellation of the contractual debt was brought about by Israeli law, it would, at least, be logical also to look to Israeli law for the consequences of such cancellation, and to regard any substituted obligation as the creature of that law, and, consequently, as situated in the country to whose law it owed its existence. It is, however, unnecessary in the view I take to give any decided answer to this hypothetical question, and I refrain from doing so. For the reasons above stated I would dismiss this appeal.

MORRIS, L.J.: When the plaintiffs presented their case at the trial of the action, it was based "first and foremost" on an alleged breach of contract before the mandate came to an end. It was said that up to May 13, 1948, the plaintiffs had persisted in an oral demand for payment of the balance of their account, that such demand had never been met, and that the contract of current account had been repudiated. After full and careful inquiry the learned judge was satisfied that there was nothing which could be said to amount to a demand the non-compliance with which would amount to a breach. In the result it was held that prior to the termination of the mandate there had been no breach of contract on the part of the defendants and no frustration. The plaintiffs do not, on appeal, challenge these conclusions, but they challenge the conclusion reached by the learned judge that their credit on current account was a liquidated sum of money the right to payment of which was not wiped out by the outbreak of war but was merely suspended. Having failed to establish that they had made demand, the plaintiffs submit that in the circumstances of the case their contract of current account was frustrated when war broke out with the result that no money was owing to them by the defendants. They submit that, where a customer has a balance on current account with a banker and has not made a demand, there is no debt at all owing by the banker and that, if banker and customer became separated by the line of war so that intercourse between them would be illegal, then their contract is at once abrogated and any credit on current account expunged. The plaintiffs submit that this is what happened as soon as war broke out following on the termination of the mandate. But they contend that the matter does not rest there. They submit that the law steps in again and does so by way of giving redress against the injustice of the enrichment which suddenly devolved on the defendants who would neither have expected nor desired to be enriched. The redress, it is said, would take the form that a new obligation would be imposed by law—an obligation to pay as a simple debt (which they would owe at the place where they reside) the amount which had previously stood to the credit of the plaintiffs on current account. In the result, therefore, the plaintiffs say that, whereas before war broke out they could at Allenby Square, Jerusalem, have demanded payment of the amount standing to their credit, the position immediately after war broke out was that the defendants in London owed the amount to the plaintiffs and had the obligation to seek them out and to pay them.

The structure of the propositions so advanced requires testing. If correct, a strange result would follow, for the law (the law of Palestine or Israel, which, it was agreed, did not differ from English law) would prohibit the defendants from paying the plaintiffs, because to pay them would involve intercourse across the line of war and would delete the debt, but, nevertheless, in defiance of the prohibition and deletion and of their purpose and reason, the law would require the defendants to pay the plaintiffs. The submissions seem to require the law to function in an erratic and quixotic manner and to alternate between destructive and creative effect. It is necessary to consider what was the position between the plaintiffs and the defendants immediately before the war began. It was that the defendants owed a sum of money to the plaintiffs in the way in which a banker owes to a customer who is in credit. In addition, the parties were mutually willing to continue to have the banking transactions denoted by the terms of the plaintiffs' letter of Feb. 14, 1939, and by the course of their dealings. The nature and features of the relationship between banker and customer were detailed by ATKIN, L.J., in his judgment in Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (1). It has never been doubted that the relation between banker and customer is that of debtor and creditor though there are, of course, super-added obligations. But I cannot think that it is correct to say that a contract of current account remains wholly executory until the account is closed or until an effective demand for payment of the whole balance has been made. The position at any given time is that many transactions will have been concluded and ended and that further transactions are anticipated, and that, if a customer is in credit, he is so because he has paid money to the banker so that a debt becomes owing by the banker to the customer which will be payable on demand. As between the plaintiffs and the defendants the position at the time of the outbreak of war was that the defendants owed a large sum to the plaintiffs, the debt being payable at Allenby Square, Palestine, and being payable on demand. The plaintiffs had a right to make demand for payment. It seems to me that that was a form of and a right to property. It has been the policy of the law not to confiscate enemy property on the outbreak of a war and there is certainly no justification for the confiscation by private persons of enemy property which they may happen to hold. Nor does an existing liability to pay money to an enemy become terminated. It would, therefore, appear to be a strange and irrational result if, after war broke out in Palestine, the defendants became relieved of the debt which they owed. The debt was owing and was unquestioned and would at any time on demand have been paid. The plaintiffs had money owing to them and could themselves have chosen the time to ask for payment of it. It cannot be said that they had a property right only if and when they made demand, and not before such time. Either before or after a demand they had a property right. In the one case, the money would be immediately payable, and, in the other case, it would await an indication of their wishes as to the moment when it was to be paid. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a departure from principle as well as a violation of reason if it were held that after the outbreak of war the debt owed by the defendants to the plaintiffs became expunged. It would be strange and mercurial to eliminate a liability which the debtor would not wish to disown and then to fix him with a new and different obligation on the footing that he had been unjustly enriched. Unless directed by principle or by authority, it seems to me a pointless and profitless procedure for the law artificially to create a void and then to proceed artificially to fill it.

In Hugh Stevenson & Sons v. Akt. für Cartonnagen Industrie (22) LORD FINLAY, L.C., referred ([1918] A.C. 245) to

" . . . the principle that the property of an enemy is not confiscated, though his right to have it back is suspended during war."

Earlier in his speech (ibid., 244) he said:

" It is not the law of this country that the property of enemy subjects is confiscated. Until the restoration of peace the enemy can, of course, make no claim to have it delivered up to him, but when peace is restored he is considered as entitled to his property with any fruits which it may have borne in the meantime."

To the same effect was the statement of VISCOUNT HALDANE (ibid., 247):

" The law of this country does not in general confiscate the property of an enemy. He cannot claim to receive it during war, but his right to his property is not extinguished; it is merely suspended."

It is said, however, by the plaintiffs that, as they had not made a demand before the outbreak of war, the result was that they had no accrued right which could survive in suspension, but that their contract with the defendants remained mutually executory, and so was dissolved on the outbreak of war. [His LORDSHIP read passages from the speeches of LORD DUNEDIN ([1918] A.C. 269) and of LORD SUMNER (ibid., 289) in Ertel Bieber & Co. v. Rio Tinto Co. (14), and continued:] The plaintiffs submit that, as they had not made a pre-war demand, they did not have a cause of action which had already accrued before the war. But LORD SUMNER spoke (ibid.) of the existence of a cause of action as implying an existing obligation to pay, and the important consideration is as to the effect of war on such an obligation. Just as "accrued rights" under a contract are not affected, so such an obligation is not destroyed. In tune with this principle it seems to me that an existing or accrued right to demand payment of a sum of money which is owing ought not to be destroyed though it will be suspended.

Under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, the court may on proof

" . . . that any other person is indebted to such debtor . . . order that all debts owing or accruing from such third person . . . to such debtor . . ."

shall be attached. If a debtor has a bank balance, the bank is regarded as "indebted" to the customer and the credit balance would be a debt "owing or accruing". If the line of war divides a creditor from one who owes him a debt which is both due and payable, the latter, as debtor, could not discharge his obligation of seeking out his creditor, for to do so would involve unlawful intercourse. Yet the debt is not expunged but is merely suspended. This serves to illustrate that the policy of the law is to avoid the confiscation of property even if there is some outstanding duty which would, or might, for its performance require intercourse across the line of war.

[His LORDSHIP read a passage from the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1946] 1 All E.R. 45) in Schering, Ltd. v. Stockholms Enskilda Bank Aktiebolag (13), and continued:] It is to be observed that LORD RUSSELL, who dissented from the majority, but not, apparently, in regard to the principles of law, includes within the words "liquidated sum" a sum which though "debitum in praesenti" is "solvendum in futuro". He was speaking in reference to "a contract which is completely executed." What, then, is the position in regard to a contract of current account where many past transactions are ended and concluded, where at the moment of outbreak of war there is a balance or debt owing to the customer, and where there was an expectation of the continuation of business on the same lines as before? The answer is, I think, denoted by LORD THANKERTON in his speech in the same case, where he said (ibid., 41):

" I am inclined to agree with SIR ARNOLD McNAIR's suggestion . . . that the distinction between 'executed' and 'executory contracts' may not be very helpful in this connection, and that it may be safer to say that the effect of the outbreak of war upon contracts legally affected by it is to abrogate or destroy any subsisting right to further performance other than the right to the payment of a liquidated sum of money, which will be treated as a debt and will survive the outbreak of war."

The result is, in my judgment, that, when the war broke out, the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was abrogated in the sense that the continued existence of the contractual relationship was prohibited. But that did not involve destruction of the contract in regard to what had already been done or obliterate any accrued rights or existing debts. The position between the parties on the outbreak of war differed from that which existed between the parties in the Fibrosa case (4). In that case a debt arose by operation of law. In the present case a debt existed in fact and did not depend for its vitality on the assistance of any conception of law. While, therefore, when the war began the further performance of the contract between the parties was abrogated, the right of the plaintiffs to demand payment of the sum outstanding to their credit at the defendants' Allenby Square branch was not abrogated, but was suspended. I consider, therefore, that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

J. D'ALMEIDA ARAUJO LDA. v. SIR FREDERICK BECKER & CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), May 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 1953.]

Conflict of Laws—Contract—Breach—Damages—Remoteness of damage—Contract governed by lex loci contractus—Law applicable to question of remoteness.

The defendants, an English company, agreed to buy five hundred tons of palm oil from the plaintiffs, a Portuguese company. Payment was to be made by the defendants opening a credit in escudos in Lisbon in favour of the plaintiffs. To fulfil their contract with the defendants, the plaintiffs bought the palm oil in Lisbon from M., it being agreed that payment was to be made by the plaintiffs opening a credit in Lisbon in escudos in favour of M., and, if either party should fail to fulfil the contract, that party should pay to the other party, as indemnity for the damage, an amount corresponding to five per cent. of the total value of the contract. The defendants failed to open the necessary credit in Lisbon as a result of which the plaintiffs did not open the credit in favour of M., and were compelled to pay him £3,500 as indemnity. It was agreed that the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was governed by the lex loci contractus, Portuguese law. On a claim by the plaintiffs to recover the £3,500 from the defendants,

HELD: the question whether the plaintiffs could recover from the defendants the £3,500 which they had paid to M. was one of remoteness of damage; such a question must be determined by the proper law of the contract and not treated as a procedural or remedial matter determinable according to the lex fori (in the present case, English law); and, therefore, the question fell to be determined according to Portuguese law by which the £3,500 was recoverable.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

In February and March, 1947, by a contract contained in a series of letters and cables, the plaintiffs, a Portuguese company, agreed to sell, and the defendants, an English company in London, agreed to buy, five hundred tons of palm oil at the price of 14.20 escudos per kilogram f.o.b. Angola, Portuguese West Africa. Payment was to be made by an irrevocable letter of credit in escudos to be opened with the Banco de Angola in Lisbon by the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs by Mar. 24, 1947. Both the plaintiffs and the defendants were middlemen in the transaction, and by a contract dated Mar. 20, 1947, the plaintiffs bought the palm oil from one Gustavo Mourao in Lisbon, who, in turn, bought it from one Guimaraes through the latter's agent in Lisbon. By their contract with Mourao the plaintiffs were to open an irrevocable credit in Mourao's favour at the Banco de Angola in Lisbon by Mar. 24, 1947, and, if either party failed to fulfil the contract, the defaulting party was to pay the other party, as indemnity for the damage, an amount corresponding to five per cent. of the total value of the contract. The defendants, while negotiating with the plaintiffs, agreed to sell the palm oil at a higher price to a French company, the Société Basque de Commission. Payment was to be made by an irrevocable letter of credit in escudos to be opened in Lisbon by the French company in favour of the defendants. The French company, in their turn, contracted to sell the palm oil to a Swiss company on similar terms as to payment. The Swiss buyers failed to open the necessary credit, as a result of which the French company failed to open the credit in escudos in favour of the defendants who, in their turn, failed to open the credit in escudos in Lisbon in favour of the plaintiffs. As a result of this, the plaintiffs did not open the credit in favour of Mourao in Lisbon, and on May 20, 1947, in accordance with their contract of Mar. 20, 1947, they paid to Mourao 350,000 escudos as indemnity, the equivalent in English currency at that time of £3,500. The plaintiffs claimed this £3,500, and a further £1,000 for loss of profit, from the defendants. The plaintiffs and the defendants agreed that their contract was governed by Portuguese law, but, while the plaintiffs contended that the damages to which they were entitled were also to be determined by Portuguese law, the defendants contended that where the substantive contract was governed by a foreign law, procedural or remedial questions, which included the question of damages, ought to be determined by the lex fori—in the present case the law of England.

Mocatta, Q.C., and J. M. Shaw for the plaintiffs.

Phillimore, Q.C., and Scarman for the defendants.

PILCHER, J., stated the facts, found that a concluded contract was arrived at between the plaintiffs and the defendants, one of the terms of which was that credit should be opened by the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs as soon as was reasonably possible in the ordinary course of business, that under Portuguese law the plaintiffs were contractually bound to pay, and did pay, to Mourao the sum of £3,500, and that the defendants were in breach of their contract to open the credit provided for by the contract within a reasonable time, and continued: While it was common ground between the parties that the substantive contract between them was governed by Portuguese law, the plaintiffs contended that the damages which they were entitled to recover in the particular circumstances of the case were also to be determined in accordance with the principles of Portuguese law. The defendants, on the contrary, submitted that, even where the substantive contract is governed by foreign law, procedural or remedial questions, which include the question of damages, ought to be determined according to the lex fori, in this case the law of England. Subject to the question of the obligation of an innocent party to mitigate the damages, to which I will refer in a moment, the question of the proper law to be applied in regard to the damages has importance, because the plaintiffs are seeking to recover from the defendants the £3,500 as one head of damage, that being the sum they had to pay to Mourao for failing to carry out their contract with him.

The loss sustained by the plaintiffs in paying that sum was clearly not a loss which was foreseeable by the defendants at the time when they negotiated this contract with the plaintiffs, and it is quite clear that under English law this sum of £3,500 would be irrecoverable by the plaintiffs from the defendants. It was argued by counsel for the plaintiffs that under Portuguese law the plaintiffs would have been entitled to include this sum in their damages if damages were assessed in accordance with Portuguese law. While I feel no certainty that the plaintiffs' right to recover damages will turn out in the end to be any different, whether the principles of English or Portuguese law are applied, it is none the less desirable that I should state my view on the point.

I was referred to a number of text-books on the particular point whether, in a foreign contract which has to be determined by the lex loci contractus, the issue of damages is, in the words of some of the text-book writers "a procedural or remedial matter" such as falls to be determined in accordance with the lex fori, or whether, on the other hand, it is part of the substantive contract between the parties and so to be determined in accordance with the lex loci contractus. I propose to read certain short passages from the text-books to which I have been referred because there is very little authority indeed on this particular topic in English law. The passage from DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., to which I wish to refer, is at pp. 649 and 650:

"A further difficulty is created by the problem of how to distinguish between the effect of the contract and the remedies which are available for its enforcement. Whether a contract gives rise to a claim for performance or to a claim for damages, whether, in the event of a breach of contract, the other party has a right to rescind it, whether interest is payable on a debt—all these are matters which, on a proper analysis, should be regarded as affecting the rights and obligations to which the contract gives rise. While it is clear that, in the view of the English courts, the liability to pay contractual interest and the rate of such interest are determined by the proper law, it appears to be a generally accepted view that the measure of damages is, in an English court, governed by English law, whatever be the proper law of the contract. This principle is apt to deprive a party of rights he would have enjoyed under the proper law or to confer upon him an uncovenanted benefit merely owing to the fact that he happened to be able to invoke the jurisdiction of an English court. Its rigour could be mitigated if, following Cheshire's suggestion, the courts could separate from the question of the measure of damages that known as the 'remoteness of damage' and hold that it was one of the effects of a contract to determine what events may and must be taken into account in assessing the damages for which a party is liable."

On p. 862 the following passage occurs:

"While there is little authority, it appears that English courts, contrary to the prevailing American practice, tend to hold that damages are a matter of procedure in an action based on a foreign tort. In contract, there is no direct English authority, but it is submitted that questions of remoteness of damage should be determined by the proper law of the contract, and should not be treated as a matter of procedure: Livesley v. Horst (1). The rate of interest to be allowed (if any) for breach of a foreign contract must depend on its proper law."

There are certain passages in CHESHIRE'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 4th ed., to which I also want to refer. After dealing, at pp. 658 and 659, with the principles on which damages are recoverable in this country in actions founded respectively in contract and tort, the learned author continues at p. 659:

"The truth would appear to be that judicial pronouncements and the statements in text-books are unintelligible unless two entirely different questions are segregated. In brief, remoteness of liability or remoteness of damage must be distinguished from measure of damages. The rules relating to remoteness indicate what kind of loss actually resulting from the commission of a tort or from a breach of contract is actionable; the rules for the measure of damages show the method by which compensation for an actionable loss is calculated. Damage may be, but damages can never be, too remote. In tort the rule of remoteness established by Re Polemis & Furness, Withy & Co. (2) is that a tortfeasor is responsible for all the direct consequences of his wrongful act, even though they could not reasonably have been anticipated. The analogous rule in contracts, however, is different. The breach of a contract, like the commission of a tort, causes material loss, and it is that loss to which the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (3) applies. In other words, it is impossible to claim monetary compensation in respect even of an admitted loss unless it arose naturally and in the ordinary course of things from the breach of contract. But the rule that regulates the measure of damages is the same for contracts as it is for torts. It requires restitutio in integrum. In torts compensation must be paid for the whole of the direct loss; in contracts, as Robinson v. Harman (4) insists, compensation must be paid for the whole of the natural or foreseeable loss. Alive to the distinction between remoteness of liability and measure of damages we can now attempt to state the relevant principles of private international law. There can be no doubt, at least on principle, that remoteness of liability must be governed by the proper law of the obligation that rests upon the defendant. Not only the existence, but also the extent, of an obligation, whether it springs from a breach of contract or the commission of a wrong, must be determined by the system of law from which it derives its source. The proper law admittedly determines the nature and content of the right created by a contract, and it is clear that the kind of loss for which damages are recoverable upon breach forms part of that content. Both the nature and the content of a contractual right depend in part upon the question whether certain consequential loss that may ensue if the contract is unperformed will be too remote in the eye of the law. If the proper law determines what constitutes a breach, it is also entitled to determine the consequences of a breach."

The conclusion at which Professor CHESHIRE arrives would seem to be that questions of remoteness of damage should be governed by the proper law of the contract, whereas the quantification of damage, which according to the proper law is not too remote, should be governed by the lex fori.

I must also refer to Livesley v. Horst (1), in which the headnote is as follows:

"The right to damages for breach of a contract made in a foreign country and to be executed there is governed by the lex loci contractus and not by the lex fori."

The case was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia affirming the judgment of the trial judge. The contract was one which in its substance was governed by Californian law, and the only material issue, from my point of view, with which the Supreme Court of Canada was concerned was whether or not the measure of damages was also governed by the law of California. The case concerned the sale of hops, and I do not think I need refer to the facts any further. DUFF, J., said this ([1924] S.C.R. 606):

"The only question requiring discussion is the question raised by the appellant's contention that, as to the measure of damages, the rights of the plaintiff are governed by the law of British Columbia, and not by the law of California. There is not, and in view of the evidence there could not be, any serious controversy, either as to the law of California or as to its application to the facts. The expert witnesses are in agreement upon the point that, by virtue of the rules laid down in the California code, the plaintiffs acquired, under each of the contracts we are concerned with, a lien upon the subject-matter of the sale as soon as it was identified, for a sum equivalent to the purchase price; that, accessory to this lien, there is given by the same provisions a power of sale by auction on default of payment; and that, if a sum equal to the amount of the purchase money is not realised from the sale, the vendor also becomes entitled to require from the purchaser payment of the difference between the amount so realised and the sum due to the vendor under the contract of sale. The vendor is entitled to bid at the sale. And again there could be no dispute in view of what occurred at the trial, that each of the sales by the plaintiff was a sale valid in California; or that under the law and in the courts of that State the plaintiff is entitled to recover at all would be entitled to the amounts which have been awarded by the judgments appealed from. But damages are not exigible, the appellants argue, under the terms of the contract itself, but under a new obligation, which, with its accessory right of action, springs from the breach of contract; and this right, being strictly remedial in its nature, must on principle, it is said, be derived from and ruled by the lex fori and not the proper law of the contract. There is singularly little express authority of English law upon the broad question whether in an action on a foreign contract—that is, a contract made abroad, and to be executed abroad—the right to unliquidated damages for a breach of it is a right determined and measured by English law or by the appropriate foreign law; although, as we shall presently see, judicial dicta, the opinions of text-writers and the analogy of decided cases, all appear to point to a conclusion in a sense opposed to the contention of the appellants. In principle, it is difficult to discover a solid ground for refusing to classify the right to damages for breach of contract with other rights arising under the proper law of the contract, and recognisable and enforceable as such . . . The exception embraces a very wide field, and among other things excludes procedure, because the policy of the English law recognises no vested rights in procedure, and a party invoking the jurisdiction of the courts must take procedure as he finds it. The concept of procedure, too, is, in this connection, a comprehensive one, including process and evidence, methods of execution, rules of limitation affecting the remedy of the course of the court with regard to the kind of relief that can be granted to a suitor. But it does not, of course, extend to substantive rights; and here the questions as to substantive rights include all questions as to the 'nature and extent of the obligation ' under the foreign contract. Fergusson v. Fyffe (5) per LORD COTTENHAM, L.C. (8 Cl. & Fin. 140). It is most important to observe that it is not the foreign agreement to which effect is given by English law but, as the language of the accurate judge, whose judgment is quoted, suggests, it is the civil or legal right generated by the contract. The right of action, as WILLES, J., said in Phillips v. Eyre (6) (L.R. 6 Q.B. 28), is a 'creature' of the law by which the contract is governed. Applying the principle to the circumstances of the case before us, the lien given to the vendor, and the accessory right of sale, are obviously substantive rights given by the law of California to the vendor as such; in his capacity, that is to say, as seller under a contract of sale. And the right to recover the difference between the contract price and the moneys realised on the sale would seem to be not less so."

The question which I have to determine really depends, if I accept and adopt, as I do accept and adopt, the analysis given by Professor CHESHIRE in his work, on whether or not the £3,500 which the plaintiffs have had to pay to Mourao is a head of damages which is recoverable on principles of remoteness of damage, or whether it is to be regarded as a mere established quantification of a part of the loss the plaintiffs have in fact sustained. While the decision in Livesley v. Horst (1) is not binding on me and while the facts of that case can be distinguished from those now before me, it is none the less a decision which I must, and do, treat with respect. I confess that in the absence of any direct authority I was attracted by the reasoning in the passage I have quoted from Professor CHESHIRE'S work. Fortified by the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, to which I have just referred, I conclude that the question whether the plaintiffs are entitled to claim from the defendants the £3,500 which they have paid to Mourao depends on whether that damage is, or is not, too remote. In my view, the question is one of remoteness, and, therefore, falls to be determined in accordance with Portuguese law. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover this sum under Portuguese law is, however, another matter.

[His LORDSHIP found as a fact that the plaintiffs could have recovered the £3,500 from the defendants under Portuguese law, subject to their obligation to mitigate those damages. He further held that the plaintiffs' obligation to mitigate was the same under Portuguese as under English law, that the plaintiffs could and should have disposed of the palm oil after being informed by the defendants of their inability to carry out the contract, and that, if the plaintiffs had done so, they would have sustained no loss. He, accordingly, awarded them nominal damages which he assessed at 40s.]

PETER DUMENIL & CO., LTD. v. JAMES RUDDIN, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), May 18, 19, 1953.]

Contract—Repudiation—Anticipatory breach—Refusal by sellers' agent to deliver part of goods sold.

By a contract, dated Jan. 4, 1952, the sellers agreed to sell and the buyers agreed to buy one hundred and forty cases of Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, which the sellers deposited with a cold storage company. The purchase price was paid and the sellers gave to the buyers a document in the nature of a delivery order addressed to the storage company. On Mar. 14, after giving due notice, the buyers made demand on the storage company for delivery of twenty-five cases, but they were told by the company's servants in error that there were no Gaythorn brand rabbits in the stores. No further step was taken by the buyers until Mar. 17, when they wrote to the sellers claiming the return of the purchase price. In an action for the return of the price, the buyers contended that the sellers, by their agents, the storage company, in declining to deliver the goods had evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract which they (the buyers) were entitled to rescind.

HELD: there was a breach of contract with regard to the non-delivery of the twenty-five cases which should have been delivered on Mar. 14, and in respect of that breach the buyers were entitled to damages, but no request was made for the delivery of any further cases and the mistake made by the sellers' agents would have been discovered if the buyers had taken reasonable steps to inquire into the matter, and in the circumstances the failure to deliver the twenty-five cases coupled with the innocent misrepresentations made by the sellers' agents did not show an intention on the part of the seller, no longer to be bound by the contract, and, therefore, there had not been any repudiation of the contract by them.

APPEAL from an order of PARKER, J., dated Jan. 22, 1953.

Duveen, Q.C., and A. L. Figgis for the buyers.

Ashton Roskill, Q.C., and McKinnon for the sellers.

SINGLETON, L.J.: At the beginning of 1952, the defendants had a number of cases of Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, ex s.s. Orion, and they agreed to sell one hundred and forty cases to the plaintiffs. The purchase price was fixed and paid. When the contract was made the sellers gave to the buyers a document in the nature of a delivery order, No. 1224. It is addressed to the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, Park Street, S.E.1, and reads:

"Please deliver to Messrs. Peter Dumenil & Co., Ltd., 1, St. John's Lane, E.C.1, one hundred and forty cases of Australian skinned rabbits Gaythorn brand."

A That document is dated Jan. 4, 1952. A delivery order is an order given by the seller on a bailee who holds possession as agent of the seller, and until it is acted on a delivery order, properly so called, is a mere "promise to deliver", the delivery not being complete until the bailee attorns to the buyer and thus becomes the buyer's agent as custodian of the goods. Nothing further was done by the buyers until Mar. 13, 1952, when they wrote to the Crown Wharf Cold Stores a letter in these terms:

B "Dear Sirs, We enclose herewith transfer No. 1224 issued by Messrs. James Ruddin in respect of one hundred and forty cases of Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, which they have transferred to our account. We propose to withdraw twenty-five cases of these rabbits tomorrow morning, Friday, 14 instant, and we should be pleased if you would have these available for us at 10 o'clock . . ."

C When that letter was written by the buyers the Crown Wharf Cold Stores were still in possession of the goods which had been deposited with them some considerable time before. On Mar. 14 the buyers' carter went to the cold stores and took with him a document which referred to the document No. 1224, and asked for delivery of twenty-five cases of Australian skinned rabbits, "Gaythorn, ex Ruddins." The carter did not receive the cases of rabbits. There was a misunderstanding between him and someone at the warehouse, and he was told that they had no Gaythorn rabbits. The word "Gaythorn" was struck
D out of the note he had taken with him in red, and he was offered some cases of rabbits marked "G.P.L." That was the finding of PARKER, J., who said that the warehouseman had used words to the effect: "I do not know anything about Gaythorn; you can have G.P.L.'s." The carter, accordingly, rang up the buyers' headquarters to ask what he was to do, and they said they were taking only Gaythorn brand rabbits. He was assured again by the warehouse-
E man that there were no Gaythorn rabbits in the stores and he was handed back the documents he had taken with him. Thereupon Mr. Dumenil, the managing director of the buyers, telephoned to the stores and spoke to someone who said he was the superintendent. In his evidence Mr. Dumenil said that he was told that there were no Gaythorn rabbits in the stores and the judge accepted that statement. The two companies, the buyers and the sellers, have
F offices which are near each other, and they are in regular communication. Mr. Dumenil said that he saw the sellers' salesman almost daily, but no step was taken by the buyers until Mar. 17 when Mr. Dumenil on behalf of his company wrote to the sellers:

G "We return herewith transfer No. 1224 in respect of one hundred and forty cases of Gaythorn brand Australian skinned rabbits which we understand from the cold stores superintendent are not in fact held in Crown Wharf to your account. These one hundred and forty boxes of rabbits were purchased on a transfer which you issued to us on Jan. 4 against a sample six boxes which we had in our store here and inspected, and we, in turn, have sold these rabbits to our client as Gaythorn skinned rabbits ex Crown Wharf Cold Stores. Our client, who decided to start clearing these rabbits this
H week, has now been informed that these rabbits are not in Crown Wharf Cold Stores to be transferred to his account and has, not unnaturally, been extremely annoyed, and has not only returned our transfer to us, but has issued us with a demand that his money be refunded to him. You will, of course, appreciate that this not only causes a good deal of unpleasant feeling with our client, but places us in an extremely difficult position. In view of the fact that this particular brand of rabbits was sold by us in Crown Wharf Cold Stores and we are now no longer in a position to fulfil our contract, it has been necessary for us to refund the amount charged to our client, and we, therefore, have no alternative but to return your transfer and ask you to be good enough to let us have a cheque in respect of this outstanding amount at your early convenience."

The buyers had sold some twenty-five cases although it is not clear from the evidence how many. They had not sold the others, and it is clear that they could not have sold them at the contract price, because, according to the finding of the learned judge, there had been a fall of about twenty-five per cent. in the price of skinned rabbits of this class. On Apr. 24, 1952, the buyers commenced an action claiming their money back. The statement of claim was not delivered until Feb. 11, 1953, and that shows that their claim is for £682 10s. moneys payable by the sellers to the buyers for moneys received by the sellers for the use of the buyers, and, alternatively, damages for breach of contract. Particulars are given, and para. 3 of the particulars reads:

"On Mar. 13, 1952, the plaintiffs sent the said delivery order to the said stores and on Mar. 14, 1952, demanded from the said stores twenty-five of the said cases. The said stores on behalf of the defendants refused to deliver any of the said cases to the plaintiffs whereby the defendants wrongfully repudiated the said agreement and the consideration for the payment of the said £682 10s. has wholly failed."

Counsel, on behalf of the sellers, has pointed out to this court that the points of claim do not raise in so many words a case of anticipatory breach of contract. I am inclined to think that the pleader meant to cover that point by para. 3 of the particulars which I have just read. The sellers pleaded:

"The said stores did not refuse as alleged nor were they the agents of the defendants in the alleged or any respect . . . The alleged repudiation and the alleged failure of consideration are denied and traversed."

The surprising thing is that at the time the demand was made on Mar. 14, 1952, there were one hundred and forty cases of Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, ex s.s. Orion in the Crown Wharf Cold Stores. The warehouseman did not look at the cases properly. Had he done so he would have seen the word "Gaythorn" marked on them, but they were noted in his book as "G.P.L." He told the buyers' carter: "I can give you G.P.L.'s, but we have no Gaythorn." In fact they are one and the same thing. The mistake was that of the warehouseman, who was the agent of the sellers to deliver, when proper demand was made by the buyers. The case which was argued before PARKER, J., was that there had been a breach by the sellers through their agents which entitled them (the buyers) to repudiate the whole of the contract and to have their money returned as money paid on a consideration which had failed. PARKER, J., was satisfied that there was a mistake, and that the mistake was that of the sellers' agents. What resulted from that? We were told by counsel for the sellers that the case was not put as one of an anticipatory breach of contract before PARKER, J., who was not referred to the authorities on that branch of the law. In the course of his judgment, he said:

"It is said, with some force: 'Why did not Mr. Dumenil write at once to the superintendent of the cold stores and demand an explanation?' Each case, as it seems to me, must depend upon its own facts. But on the facts in this case, I do not think it could possibly be said that the buyers were not justified in treating what the carter was shown and told on Mar. 14 as, if you like, an anticipatory breach. The carter was . . . told by the warehouseman: 'I do not know anything about Gaythorns'. Having been told that, it seems to me that he was perfectly justified in telephoning Mr. Dumenil and getting instructions, without in effect demanding to see the twenty-five cases which it was proposed to tender, and making certain that they were not Gaythorns. I am also satisfied that Mr. Dumenil did have a conversation with some responsible official of the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, who, at any rate, conveyed to him, as the warehouseman had conveyed to the carter, that they knew nothing about Gaythorns. I think, having had that conversation with the person he understood to be the superintendent, he was abundantly justified in telling his sub-buyer that the goods were not available and in claiming from the sellers the return of the money."

I agree with the learned judge that Mr. Dumenil was justified in telling the sub-buyer that the twenty-five cases were not available. There is no doubt as to that. The goods should have been handed over on Mar. 14, and for that breach of contract it seems to me that the sellers are responsible to the buyers in damages, for the one who was entrusted by the sellers with the duty of handing over those goods did not do so when demand was made. That consideration, however, does not dispose of this action. It has been argued in this court on the basis that the learned judge found, as I think he did, that there was an anticipatory breach by the sellers through their agent, and that thereupon the buyers were entitled to consider the contract as repudiated and to treat it as rescinded. The question we have to determine is, I think, one of law, and it is this. If there be a contract for the sale of one hundred and forty cases of Gaythorn brand Australian skinned rabbits which are in a particular store, and on a certain day the buyers ask for delivery of twenty-five cases and are told by the warehousemen they cannot have delivery as there are no Gaythorn rabbits there, does that entitle them to say that the contract has gone as the sellers have repudiated it and have evinced an intention no longer to be bound by it? Are they entitled, in the circumstances, to treat the contract as rescinded and to recover the price which they paid?

D

This question has been considered many times, but I am not sure that it has ever had to be considered in circumstances where the repudiation by the sellers is a repudiation by the warehousemen who were their agents and when it arose purely out of a mistake. In dealing with this kind of question there are various matters for consideration. In this court we had to consider a question of a somewhat similar nature in James Shaffer, Ltd. v. Findlay Durham & Brodie (1), where some of the authorities are conveniently summarised. In Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd. (2) LORD WRIGHT said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 350):

"Perhaps the commonest application of the word 'repudiation' is to what is often called the anticipatory breach of a contract, where the party by words or conduct evinces an intention no longer to be bound, and the other party accepts the repudiation and rescinds the contract. In such a case, if the repudiation is wrongful and the rescission is rightful, the contract is ended by the rescission; but only as far as concerns future performance. It remains alive for the awarding of damages, either for previous breaches, or for the breach which constitutes the repudiation. That is only a particular form of contract breaking and would generally, under an ordinary arbitration clause, involve a dispute under the contract like any other breach of contract. There is no difference, for instance, for this purpose between a refusal to take further instalments under a contract for the sale of goods by instalments and a refusal to take the entire contract quantity where the tender is to be a single delivery. I need scarcely add that one party to a contract cannot put an end to it. To produce that effect there must be rescission. An anticipatory breach does not necessarily involve an actual intention to break the contract. Intention is to be judged by the party's conduct. The difference between repudiating a contract and repudiating liability under it must not be overlooked. It is thus necessary in every case in which the word repudiation is used to be clear in what sense it is being used."

H

In Freeth v. Burr (3) LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said (L.R. 9 C.P. 213):

"But I think it may be taken that the fair result of them [the cases] is as I have stated, viz., that the true question is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract."

Counsel for the buyers submitted that the sellers are responsible for the acts and conduct of their agents, and that the agents, acting for and on behalf of the sellers in declining to deliver rabbits, were thereby and by their words and conduct evincing an intention no longer to be bound by the contract. They argued that the buyers accepted that repudiation and rescinded the contract, and that they are entitled to have their money back. Whether an agent can evince an intention of this kind on behalf of the principal must depend on the agent's authority. If an agent says: "I have no such goods for my principal", he is at least refusing to deliver. The superintendent said, according to Mr. Dumenil, that he had no such goods in the stores at that time. The contention is that by what was said and done on Mar. 14, the sellers showed the buyers that they no longer intended to be bound by the contract. The sellers' obligation was to give delivery when it was demanded on reasonable notice; they were under an obligation on proper notice to the Crown Wharf Cold Stores to see that the stores gave delivery of the required number of cases ex the Orion. If an agent makes a mistake which can be corrected, and that mistake leads him to think that he has no such goods as those asked for, does his conduct show on behalf of the principal an intention not to be further bound by the contract? That is a matter which must depend on the circumstances in each particular case. I do not think that it did in this case. I agree that there was a breach of contract in regard to the twenty-five cases which ought to have been delivered on Mar. 14, 1952. There was no request for delivery of any more, and I am unable to see that the failure to deliver the twenty-five, coupled with the warehouseman's statement: "We have none", is sufficient to enable the buyers to say the sellers evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract. I much regret that the authorities on this part of the case were not before PARKER, J. He gave judgment in favour of the buyers, holding that there was on the part of the sellers an anticipatory breach which entitled the buyers to treat the contract as rescinded. I do not agree to that extent. I think there was a breach in respect of the twenty-five cases, and as the buyers had paid for them they are entitled to recover against the sellers damages in respect of the non-delivery of those cases. Over and above that, I do not think the buyers are entitled to succeed. Therefore, in my view, this appeal should be allowed in part.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The facts as found by the learned judge are that, having regard to what passed between the warehouseman and the buyers' carter, and having regard to what passed between Mr. Dumenil and the superintendent of the stores on the telephone, the buyers genuinely believed, and were justified in believing, that there were no Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, held at the Crown Wharf Cold Stores for the account of the sellers—in other words, that there were at that time at the stores no rabbits answering the contractual description of which the buyers were entitled to have delivery on presentation of the delivery order which had been given to them by the sellers against payment of the purchase price of the rabbits. The question is whether the belief induced in the minds of the buyers by what was said to their carter and to Mr. Dumenil by the representatives of the Crown Wharf Cold Stores supports their claim to be entitled to consider the whole contract repudiated by the sellers, and repudiated by way of anticipatory breach. That, I think, resolves itself into the question whether, on the facts as represented to them by the servants of the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, the buyers were entitled to infer that, in the words of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Freeth v. Burr (3) (L.R. 9 C.P. 213), the sellers thereby "evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract". One must also bear in mind that, as appears from the citation in James Shaffer, Ltd. v. Findlay Durham & Brodie (1) ([1953] 1 W.L.R. 117), from the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in Spetabile Consorzio Veneziano di Armamento e Navigazione v. Northumberland Shipbuilding Co., Ltd. (4) (121 L.T. 634):

"They [i.e., the various judicial definitions of 'repudiation'] all come to the same thing, and they all amount at any rate to this, that it must be shown that the party to the contract made quite plain his own intention not to perform the contract."

B

The sellers' agents, the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, had by their servants made an innocent misrepresentation of fact which the buyers were entitled to believe and did believe. That state of facts, if true, meant that there were no rabbits in the cold stores to answer the buyers' demand under the contract, and, therefore, I think, clearly meant that the sellers were in breach of their contract at that date, but can it be said that the buyers were entitled to draw the inference from that believed state of facts that the sellers had evinced an intention not to carry out their contract?

C

In my view, one cannot attribute that result to the state of facts as represented to the buyers. No doubt, what the buyers believed, that is to say, the absence from the cold stores of any Australian skinned rabbits of the appropriate brand, suggested that the sellers might be intending not to carry out their contract, but I cannot think it goes any further than that the buyers might reasonably say to themselves: "This looks as though the sellers have repudiated, or are intending to repudiate, the contract, unless there is some other explanation." It seems to me one must make that reservation—"unless there is some other explanation." I think it is impossible to say that there might not have been some other explanation. Possibly the sellers, still intending to honour their contract in every respect, might, for some reason or other, have removed the one hundred and forty cases of rabbits to some other store where they would be just as easily available. Perhaps the sellers might have made some other mistake, for example, they might have deposited the cases in one cold store and inadvertently given the buyers the address of another. If it be right to say that the most the buyers could properly infer was an intention on the part of the sellers to repudiate the contract unless there was some other explanation of the apparent absence from the stores of any rabbits of the appropriate brand, then it behoved them to take the simple and reasonable step, which any business man would take, of going to the sellers and saying: "What has happened about our rabbits? We are told by the Crown Wharf Cold Stores that there are none there." I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed save as regards any relief to which the buyers may be entitled to in respect of the twenty-five cases.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in entire agreement with the two judgments which have been delivered. I think that it is of assistance in approaching the matters which arise in this appeal to state what was the promise made by the sellers. It seems to me that they promised the buyers that, in consideration of the payment to them by the buyers of a sum of money, they undertook that, if within a reasonable period or from time to time within such a period, the buyers made demand on the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, they would receive Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, ex s.s. Orion to a total of one hundred and forty cases. On Mar. 14 there was a demand for twenty-five cases. The position at that date was that there were one hundred and forty cases of Australian skinned rabbits, Gaythorn brand, at the Crown Wharf Cold Stores, but the warehouseman erroneously said that, although they had rabbits belonging to James Ruddin, Ltd., those rabbits were not in fact Gaythorn brand. Later in the day that was repeated by the superintendent of the Crown Wharf Cold Stores. It seems to me that, as the buyers made a proper demand for twenty-five cases, the sellers were in breach of contract, because the buyers were not able to obtain the twenty-five cases. When the buyers were told by the Crown Wharf Cold Stores that there were no rabbits which satisfied the contract in the store, it must have come to them as a surprise. The buyers had paid a sum of nearly £700, and on the first occasion when they demanded rabbits in accordance with the contract they were told: "There are not any rabbits to satisfy the contract here." It seems to me that the buyers must have thought that there was some mistake and that there would be some simple explanation if they sought it. In my view, the appropriate question to ask is whether the sellers made plain an intention not to perform the contract. It seems to me there was nothing to suggest that the sellers were not proposing to perform the contract, except this rather surprising statement, due to a misapprehension, made by the Crown Wharf Cold Stores. A reasonable thing for the buyers to have done would have been to seek an explanation which could so readily have been forthcoming. While I think there was a breach in regard to the twenty-five cases, I do not think that there was any further failure on the part of the sellers, or that they evinced an intention not further to perform their contract.

Appeal allowed in part.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), April 27, 28, 29, 30, May 1, 4, 22, 1953.]

Conflict of Laws—Succession to estate of intestate—Foreign domicil of intestate—Personal property in England—Claim by foreign State as sole and universal heir.

On Oct. 11, 1924, the deceased, a Spanish citizen domiciled in Spain, died there a widow and intestate, leaving personal property in England. On June 4, 1930, the State of Spain obtained a declaration of heirship on failure of heirs on intestacy.

HELD: on the evidence, under Spanish law the State of Spain was the sole and universal heir of the deceased, and, there being nothing contrary to English public policy or repugnant to English law in a foreign State being permitted to take possession of the movables of one of its citizens in this country, the State of Spain was entitled to a grant of letters of administration of the English estate of the deceased.

ACTION by the State of Spain claiming a grant of letters of administration of the English estate of Eloisa Hernandez Maldonado, deceased.

A The deceased was a Spanish citizen domiciled in Spain. On Oct. 11, 1924, she died a widow and intestate, leaving securities to the value of £13,515 5s. 4d. in the custody of Hambros Bank, Ltd., London. At the date of her death the deceased had no collaterals within the sixth degree for the purpose of art. 955 of the Spanish Civil Code (amended, on Jan. 13, 1928, to collaterals within the fourth degree), and, therefore, art. 956 which, prior to its amendment on Jan. 13, 1928, read:

B “In default of persons having the right to inherit in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing sections the State shall inherit, the assets being devoted to institutions of charity and free instruction in the following order: (i) municipal charitable establishments and free schools of the place of residence of the deceased, (ii) establishments of both classes of the province to which the deceased belonged, (iii) charitable establishments and educational establishments of a general character.”

C On June 4, 1930, the State of Spain obtained in Spain a declaration of heirship in accordance with art. 958, “to enable the State to take physical possession of the estate”. The State of Spain, as plaintiff, now claimed a grant to its duly constituted attorney of letters of administration of the English assets, as the sole and universal heir by Spanish law. The Treasury Solicitor, as defendant, claimed that the English assets as bona vacantia belonged to the Crown which D was, therefore, entitled to a grant of letters of administration.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and Victor Russell for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

E May 22. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. This action concerns the personal estate in England of Eloisa Hernandez Maldonado, who died on Oct. 11, 1924, a widow and intestate. The deceased was a Spanish subject, and at the time of her death was domiciled in Spain. The English estate of the deceased consists of securities in the custody of Hambros Bank, Ltd., London, and valued at £13,515 5s. 4d. at the time of her death. The State of Spain as plaintiff is claiming a grant of letters of administration of the deceased's English estate, by its duly constituted attorney, as the sole and universal heir to her estate by Spanish law. The defendant in the action is the Treasury Solicitor, who claims that the estate of the deceased in England belongs to the Crown as bona vacantia, and that, therefore, the Crown is entitled to a grant of letters of administration of her estate in England. The Probate Court is really only concerned to make a grant of letters of administration to the English estate of the deceased, and by the declaration of heirship the State of Spain has been constituted the personal representative of the deceased.

LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Enohin v. Wylie (1) said (10 H.L. Cas. 13):

H “I hold it to be now put, beyond all possibility of question, that the administration of the personal estate of a deceased person belongs to the court of the country where the deceased was domiciled at his death . . . It is the right and duty of that judge [meaning the judge of the court of the domicile] to constitute the personal representative of the deceased.”

In so far as the right to the grant alone is concerned, that seems to be a complete answer to the defendant's claim. This would leave the question of distribution to be decided in the Chancery Division, but, as this issue is raised on the pleadings and as both parties seemed anxious that I should decide the whole question, and in view of s. 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which directs the Probate Court in granting administration to have regard to the rights of persons interested in the estate, I have taken on myself the task of deciding the whole question.

In such cases the rule according to English law, which has been established for more than two hundred years, is that movable property in the case of intestacy is to be distributed according to the law of domicile of the intestate at the time of his or her death. I must, therefore, look to the Spanish law to ascertain who is entitled to succeed to this property. The requisite article in the Spanish Civil Code is art. 956 prior to its amendment of Jan. 13, 1928. Article 956 read as follows:

“In default of persons having the right to inherit in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing sections the State shall inherit, the assets being devoted to institutions of charity and free instruction in the following order: (i) municipal charitable establishments and free schools of the place of residence of the deceased, (ii) establishments of both classes of the province to which the deceased belonged, (iii) charitable establishments and educational establishments of a general character.”

Both Mr. Valls, a member of the Spanish Bar and legal adviser to the Spanish embassy, and Mr. Melchor, a member of the Spanish Bar of some twenty-four years' experience and legal adviser to the Spanish Foreign Office, have given evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that the Spanish State takes the property of a deceased intestate as heir, just like any other heir, but Dr. Colas, also a member of the Spanish Bar and called as a witness by the defendant, asserts, on the other hand, that the Spanish State takes such property as heir by reason of bona vacantia, and that, although the State takes such property as heir, it is not a true heir as are family heirs, but as heir subject to certain conditions and limitations.

Dealing with Dr. Colas's first point that the Spanish State takes such property as heir by reason of bona vacantia, WOLFF ON PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 2nd ed., p. 579, states:

“In default of next-of-kin, the universal rule is that the property goes to the State or the Crown or a township or some other public body—in Germany, Italy and Switzerland as ultimate ‘heir’, in England, Austria and Turkey by virtue of a jus regale over bona vacantia. In the latter case the conflict rule on succession is not applicable because there is no ‘succession’ (inheritance) . . . the right to ‘heirless’ property is governed by the lex situs.”

WOLFF is clearly recognising two approaches to this subject, whereas Dr. Colas started his evidence on the assumption that, however the Spanish Civil Code was worded, it could not make the State an heir in the true sense. Dr. Colas was, however, unable to maintain this assertion under cross-examination. All the other text writers to whom I have been referred, including DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 818, in the commentary on r. 178, agree with WOLFF's view. I also noted that BAR'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, Gillespie's translation, 2nd ed., p. 843, s. 387, states:

“The question to which State property is to fall where there is no heir, whether to that in which it is situated, or to that to which the last possessor belonged, is dependent upon whether the right of the State to succeed is to be considered to be a right of occupation or a right of consolidation belonging to the feudal superior, or as a true right of succession. In either the first or second case, the property will go to the State where the property is situated; in the last case it will fall to that of the domicile of the deceased, in so far as both States hold the theory of an universal succession, or as the estate is made up of movables.”

It also seems to me to be implicit in both the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Barnett's Trusts (2), and in the judgment of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in In the Estate of Musurus (3), that there are these two approaches to the subject, as stated by WOLFF.

In Re Barnett's Trusts (2) an Austrian who was entitled to a fund in court in this country died in Vienna, a bastard, intestate, and without heirs. By Austrian law the succession of an Austrian citizen in such a case is confiscated as heirless property by the fiscus. The Austrian government having claimed the fund, it was held that, as the right claimed was not in the nature of a succession, the maxim "mobilia sequuntur personam" did not apply, and that the Crown, by the law of England, was entitled to the fund as bona vacantia. Article 760 of the Austrian Civil Code reads:

"If a spouse is no longer alive, the succession is confiscated as heirless property either by the fiscus or by those persons who according to the political ordinances are justified in confiscating heirless estates."

It was argued by the Crown that the succession by the law of Austria was confiscated as heirless property by the fiscus and that the right of the State, therefore, was not the right of succession, but the right to confiscate property where there was no heir. The property in question was in this country, and the law of this country is that the Crown is entitled to it as bona vacantia. The Crown, moreover, referred to the section in BAR'S PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, which I have already quoted, in support of their argument. It was never a part of the Crown's case that a foreign State could in no circumstances claim the movables in this country of a deceased intestate domiciled in that

State. KEKEWICH, J., in the course of his judgment, stated ([1902] 1 Ch. 857):

"It is because there is no one who can claim through the deceased that the Crown steps in and takes the property. The Crown takes it because it is, as it is described in the cases, bona vacantia. It is property which no one claims—property at large—there is no succession."

And (ibid., 859):

"It must come back to this: Under what circumstances does no succession arise? Under what circumstances is the paramount authority entitled to come in and say, 'I take it because there is nobody else to take'? That seems to me to be the whole question, and it matters not the least whether any description of person is allowed to come in or not, or what is the limit to those by law entitled. When once the principle which I have endeavoured to explain is arrived at, the large majority of the passages and dicta which have been quoted can be construed, regard being had to the unfortunate poverty of language which makes us speak of 'succession' when there is no succession, simply because there is no other expression which fits in so well with ordinary parlance."

In In the Estate of Musurus (3), a Turkish woman, domiciled in Turkey, died intestate and without heirs in 1915, leaving, inter alia, certain personal property in England. The British Crown claimed that, as this property was ownerless in Turkish law, it must be treated as bona vacantia. The Turkish government claimed that, under the law of the Ottoman Empire as it was in 1915, the property would have passed to the Bait al-mál, the treasury of the Moslems, which would have applied the property for the relief and benefit of the Moslems, and that, as the application of the property was thus limited to certain objects, it was impressed with something in the nature of a trust and it was impossible to liken it to bona vacantia, and it claimed the property. If for any reason the Bait al-mál did not take any uninherited property, there was no ultimate right in anyone else. It was held that the property was ownerless and the limited application of the property under Turkish law made no difference to its character, and that, as the authority by which the Turkish government claimed was in substance the same as that by which the British Crown claimed, the Crown was entitled to the property as bona vacantia. The argument for the Crown is not set out, but it would not seem from the judgment of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., that it was ever suggested by the Crown that a foreign State could in no circumstances claim the movable estate in this country of a deceased intestate domiciled in the foreign State. The Turkish embassy in this case claimed that the Turkish government was in some sense a trustee because by Turkish law it had to apply the property for the relief and benefit of Moslems, and, therefore, the property was not bona vacantia. Dr. Colas in his evidence stated the very reverse—that the State of Spain was not a true heir because it had to pass on the property in accordance with art. 956 of the Spanish Civil Code.

I have come to the conclusion that what matters is the capacity in which the person claims the property and that it is immaterial what happens to the property later. I, therefore, respectfully agree with what the President stated in the course of his judgment ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1668):

“The reason why on the one hand goods are bona vacantia in this country or why they go to the Bait al-mál in the old Ottoman Empire on the other, is because they are in the strictest sense of the word ownerless. To my mind what matters is not how the goods are disposed of when they get into the treasury, but the capacity in which they come to the treasury, and that capacity is, as I say, because they are without any owner; there is nobody who can succeed to them as an heir; there is nobody to whom they have been disposed as a legatee.”

DELGADO, the Spanish jurist, in dealing with art. 956, states:

“For some, this right of the State has the character of successor by being called to succeed as heir in default of collaterals within the fourth degree and for others, it means the enforcement of the right which the State has over vacant assets by a person who has no successor. The system of our Code follows the former principle.”

DELGADO is there referring to the amended Civil Code which cut down collaterals from the sixth to the fourth degree. All the other Spanish text writers to whom I have been referred agree with this view—CASTAN, LAGOS in his preface to DELGADO, and LLANAS. I think it is, therefore, abundantly clear that Spain falls into the same class as Germany, Italy and Switzerland referred to by WOLFF.

Dr. Colas also asserts that the Spanish State is not a true heir because it is subject to certain conditions and limitations. This view seems to me to be in conflict with the view of the above text book writers and also with the views of Mr. Valls and Mr. Melchor. Dr. Colas agreed in cross-examination that the relevant sections in the Civil Code dealing with heirship, e.g., arts. 440, 657, 658, 659, 660 and 661, applied equally to the State as heir as to an individual heir, and Mr. Valls, in his evidence, quoted a passage from MANRESA'S COMMENTARIES ON THE SPANISH CIVIL CODE, 1903, p. 143, to the effect that art. 957 required no further consideration, and all that was applicable to heirs was applicable to the State when it was an heir. Dr. Colas interpreted art. 955 as terminating the right to inherit, but it seems clear to me that that article is only stating that the right to inherit does not extend further than the sixth degree and that the emphasis should be on the words “sixth degree”, and, in any event, Dr. Colas's interpretation would be in direct conflict with art. 956 which says that the State shall inherit. As to the conditions and limitations to which Dr. Colas referred, first, in accordance with art. 957 the State is always understood to accept the estate subject to benefit of inventory. This does not apply to an individual heir. But when one examines the history of this matter one finds that originally the State was in precisely the same position as an individual heir and was liable for the deceased's debts even if they exceeded the assets, unless the State, as any other heir, applied for benefit of inventory. But on Nov. 5, 1918, a Spanish royal decree made it obligatory for the State advocate, when applying for a declaration of heirship, always to ask for benefit of inventory, and now the State is always given benefit of inventory under art. 957. Secondly, creditors against the State must follow a certain course by procedural law. Thirdly, the State must deal with the property in a certain way; and, fourthly, the State cannot accept the estate in accordance with art. 999 before a declaration of heirship. As to the second point, this is merely a procedural course which is of convenience to the State in its capacity as heir. The third point I have already dealt with, and Dr. Colas is arguing the case for the Turkish embassy in In the Estate of Musurus (3) in reverse. As to the fourth point, this is in reality inherent in the State being an heir and is in accordance with art. 958, which reads as follows:

"To enable the State to take physical possession of the estate there shall be a prior declaration of heirship in its favour by which the property is allocated to it on the failure of heirs on intestacy."

Mr. Valls stated in his evidence that there was a judgment of the Supreme Court of Spain on June 3, 1947, to the effect that property vests in the State, as heir, as from the moment of death, and, according to the evidence of Mr. Melchor, the declaration of heirship merely provides evidence of title to the property. Article 958 only deals with how the State is to get physical possession of the property. Before the State can obtain a declaration of heirship there must be a declaration by the court that the property is vacant—in other words, that there are no lawful heirs with a prior right to that of the State. This is part of the procedural law of Spain, and all the expert witnesses agree that procedural law cannot override the substantive law of Spain as set out in the Civil Code. In the present case the declaration of heirship was obtained by the State on June 4, 1930. In examining the Spanish law in order to ascertain whether or not the State is a true heir according to Spanish law, I have accepted the Spanish conception of heirship, for it would be wrong, in my view, to apply the English conception when dealing with Spanish law, and even to try to apply the nearest English equivalent to the Spanish conception of heirship would only lead to confusion. I am satisfied on the evidence before me that the State of Spain is a true heir just as any individual heir according to Spanish law.

The only matter, therefore, which remains for consideration is whether or not there is anything either contrary to public policy or so repugnant to English law as to prevent such a right acquired under a law of a foreign country from being enforced in the English courts. All civilised States take possession of ownerless property, and according to MANRESA'S COMMENTARIES ON THE SPANISH CIVIL CODE:

"The right of the State over the property of any person dying intestate and without leaving heirs, is based on the actual situation of abandonment of the property in question, on the absence of any owner and of any other person entitled thereto."

But the law of Spain has developed along different lines from that of England. The State, by Spanish law, takes the property in a line of succession as ultimate heir. In England the property belongs to the Crown as bona vacantia, and since the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 46 (1) (vi), in lieu of any right to escheat. The appearance of the Crown, as ultimately entitled to property, in a statute regulating the distribution of an intestate's estate, did not alter the capacity in which the Crown took such property. This was made clear by the Court of Appeal in In the Estate of Hanley (4), which held that the Crown under s. 46 (1) was not a person entitled on an intestacy.

Counsel for the defendant, in the course of his argument, stressed the fact that the State of Spain has created itself heir by its own act and that it becomes a question of public international law when a foreign State makes itself owner of property in another State. But I have come to the conclusion that the State of Spain is not making itself the owner of property in this country, nor is it seeking in any way to exercise its sovereignty in this country. It is merely claiming property in this country, as heir to the property by Spanish law, in the same way as one of the next of kin might claim as heir. Counsel for the defendant also argued that this claim put forward by the Spanish State conflicts with the right of the Crown to take the property as bona vacantia. This argument seems to me to beg the whole question. I feel satisfied that there is nothing either contrary to English public policy or repugnant to English law in permitting a foreign State to take possession of the movables of one of its subjects in this country. This point of view seems to me to be not only consistent with, but implicit in, the judgments of KEKEWICH, J., in Re Barnett's Trusts (2), and of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in In the Estate of Musurus (3). It also appears to me to accord with natural justice, namely, that the property of a deceased Spanish woman who died intestate should be distributed among charities in her own locality in Spain rather than go to the English Crown. I am satisfied that by Spanish law, the State of Spain is the sole and universal heir of the deceased, and that, therefore, the deceased's English assets are not ownerless, but belong to the State of Spain. I, accordingly, direct that letters of administration of the English estate of the deceased be granted to the duly constituted attorney of the Spanish State.

WHALL AND ANOTHER v. BULMAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), May 21, 1953.]

County Court—Appeal—Raising in Court of Appeal of point of law not argued in court below—Remission of case to trial judge—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 108.

Landlords claimed possession of rooms alleged to have been let under an oral agreement, confirmed in writing, by which the rooms were let "as office accommodation". It was further alleged in the particulars of claim that "it was a term of the said agreement that the said rooms should be used as office accommodation only", and that the tenant had consistently used the rooms as a dwelling-house. The landlords did not allege in their particulars an express agreement not to use the premises otherwise than for offices, nor did they plead that there was any proviso for re-entry or forfeiture on breach of the alleged term. The county court judge rejected the only defence argued before him, viz., that the rooms were let as a dwelling-house and that, therefore, the tenant was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, and he made an order for possession. On appeal,

HELD: in the absence of an allegation of an express covenant by the defendant that the rooms should not be used except as offices and of a provision for re-entry on breach of such a covenant the particulars of claim disclosed no cause of action, and the county court judge could not properly make an order for possession; the order made bore no relation to the claim as alleged; and, although the point as to the adequacy of the facts pleaded to support an order for possession was not taken before the county court judge and was not mentioned in the notice of appeal, the case would be remitted for re-hearing to the judge who tried the action.

A APPEALS by the tenant from orders of His Honour Judge RICE-JONES at Croydon County Court, dated Mar. 5, 1953.

In three actions the landlords claimed forfeiture of the leases of three rooms (let under three separate leases) on the ground that the tenant had not complied with notices dated Jan. 9, 1953, served on him in pursuance of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146. In their particulars of claim, the landlords alleged that the tenant was in breach of the leases because he had used the premises for living accommodation instead of office accommodation. The tenant admitted the notices served on him, but claimed that they were of no effect, and that it was expressly agreed between the parties that the tenant should use the premises for living accommodation. It was agreed at the trial that, if the premises were let as offices, the landlords were entitled to possession, and that the only question for decision was whether there was a letting as business premises or as a dwelling-house, the description of the letting as business premises being a mere sham. The county court judge found that the premises were let as office accommodation, and made orders for possession in six weeks. The tenant appealed, and at the hearing the Court of Appeal took the point that the landlords had not shown any cause of action. The landlords argued that the point was not raised at the trial, and, therefore, could not be taken on appeal.

Rountree for the tenant.

Ripman for the landlords.

E SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: In this case I intend to treat the three cases as though they were one for the purposes of this judgment. The claims are brought by landlords to recover possession of three rooms in High Street, Colliers Wood, London. The particulars of claim in each action, after stating that the claim is for forfeiture of the lease of the relevant room, proceeds as follows:

F “(1) By an oral agreement (subsequently confirmed in writing by the defendant on Sept. 25, 1952), the plaintiffs let to the defendant as from Sept. 13, for a minimum period of fifty-two weeks the front room on the first floor of the said premises [at a certain rent] as office accommodation (the first month to be rent free). (ii) It was a term of the said agreement that the said room should be used as office accommodation only. (iii) The defendant has consistently used the said room for living accommodation. (iv) A notice under s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, was served on the defendant by registered post on Jan. 9, 1953, requiring him to remedy the breach of condition and to pay compensation to the plaintiffs. (v) The defendant has not complied with such notice and is still using the said room as living accommodation.”

H Since reference is made to the document of confirmation I read that document. Again, I note that there are three documents mutatis mutandis in the same form. After the name of the plaintiffs and their address, there appears as a heading the word, “Agreement”, and the document continues:

“I, Mr. J. Bulman agree to rent [the room described as] an office situated above the shop premises at 46, Colliers Wood, High Street, London, S.E. 19, for a minimum period of fifty-two weeks with the option to either renew or discontinue renting at the end of the above period. In the event of it being the latter I agree to give one week's notice in writing."

On the face of it there is, to my mind, no doubt whatever that the pleading alleges an agreement which, so far as material to the claim for possession, contains no term or provision other than the terms stated in para. 1 of the particulars of claim or to be found in the written document. It is, therefore, quite plain that there is, at least, no express term or covenant not to use the premises otherwise than for offices. It is also quite manifest that there is no allegation of any proviso for re-entry on breach of the alleged covenant. It is true that in para. 4 of the particulars of claim there is a reference to "the breach of condition", but what has gone before does not, to my mind, lay any foundation for alleging that it was a "condition" of the renting that the rooms should be used for offices only. On that matter it is, indeed, permissible to add that the findings of the judge, so far as I understand them, are wholly contrary to any such contention. If I am right in my apprehension of the particulars of claim it follows that they disclose on the face of them no cause of action as alleged, and that the court could not on that pleading make and should not have made an order for possession whatever might have been said on any of the questions of fact which were debated at the trial. A B

What, in truth, happened was that the case was fought on this point, and this point only—that the letting, though described as being of office premises, was in truth a letting of those premises as and for a dwelling-house so that the defendant would be entitled to rely on the statutory protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. No point was taken (though it was open to the defendant on these pleadings to take it) that in the absence of an allegation and proof of a condition or of an allegation and proof of a proviso for re-entry, the plaintiff had not pleaded a cause of action at all. Unfortunately, the judge's attention was not drawn by counsel to that circumstance and he dealt with the matter solely on the point which was debated. On that matter he expressed his conclusion thus: C D

"I did not think that in the first instance the plaintiffs cared how the defendant used the premises as long as they were let as offices."

On that view he came to the conclusion that the suggested defence that this was a letting of a dwelling-house was not established. E

The rule has been laid down as long ago as 1891, in Smith v. Baker & Sons (1), that on appeals from the county court (which are confined by Parliament in accordance with the terms of the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 108), this court will not entertain a ground for supporting an appeal which was not taken in the court below, and that rule is one which is strictly and regularly applied in this court. The peculiarity of this case is, as I have already indicated, that the real point which on the face of the claim is fatal to its success was never apprehended, and is not even now raised in the notice of appeal. In such very exceptional circumstances, it does not seem to me that this court should allow the matter to stand as it is. It is not a question of taking a new point in support of the appeal. The point is that the order made does not bear any relation to the claim as alleged. Put another way, the claim alleged on the face of it does not support the order which was asked for and which was made. This, therefore, seems to me to be a case so exceptional in character that an exceptional remedy is called for. I think in this case that the proper course is that we should set aside the order for possession which the learned judge made, and refer the matter back for re-hearing to the same judge. I am again departing from what is common practice in this court when a new trial is ordered. The common practice is to send the matter to another judge, a practice which, of course, does not indicate any criticism of the impartiality of the first judge, but here I deliberately suggest that the matter be referred back to the same judge because I see no reason for casting any doubt on the conclusion which F G H

- the judge reached in fact on the point which he did consider. I am not, therefore, suggesting that he should re-try that particular point. Since, however, it is going back, I think that the way in which the case is further heard or a re-trial had must be a matter for the discretion of the judge himself and I do not, therefore, seek to interfere with it. I have merely made an intimation which may guide him when he has to decide what matters he will treat as open for further argument before him. I think it right that the parties should have such liberty to amend their pleadings as the judge may direct. That, again, is a matter for his discretion. In the circumstances, I should obviously not be justified in expressing any further opinion on the points which have been somewhat discussed before us, whether there is any covenant or condition relating to user, and whether, in the absence of either the one or the other, this claim for possession can possibly succeed. Since the point was never taken by the defendant either here or in his notice of appeal, it would not, in my judgment, be right to allow him costs in this court or in the court below. It is an unfortunate state of affairs, for both parties seem to me to be to blame in that, on the one hand, the plaintiffs failed to put forward a sustainable cause of action, and, on the other, the defendant failed to perceive that fact. Unfortunately, the judge was allowed by the counsel who appeared before him to deal with the matter on a false premise. In the circumstances, the just order seems to me to be that which I have suggested, viz., that the order for possession be set aside and the case referred back to the judge for re-trial on such terms as to amendment of pleadings and otherwise as he may think fit, but there should be no order for costs in favour of either party in this court or in the court below on the first hearing.

D DENNING, L.J.: When the case was opened, all the members of the court noticed at once that the claim for possession was bad, because the tenancy agreement did not contain a proviso for re-entry. It is elementary that you cannot have a forfeiture unless there is a proviso for re-entry or its equivalent. There is none such here.

E What, then, is to be done? This point was not taken below nor in the notice of appeal. Can this court itself take it? I think so, for the reason that the case comes before the court as if the parties had said to one another: "Although there is no forfeiture clause, we agree that the court should treat the case as if there was one". If the parties had knowingly made such an agreement, this court would not adjudicate on it. This court is here to try real cases, not hypothetical ones. The parties cannot agree on a false hypothesis and ask the court to adjudicate on it.

F It is most unusual for this court to interfere on a point not taken below, but in this case I agree entirely with my Lord that the only thing we can do is to send the case back for re-trial so that it can be determined on a real and not a hypothetical footing.

G ROMER, L.J.: I also agree.

TUNSTALL v. TUNSTALL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 20, 1953.]

Husband and Wife—Title to property—Matrimonial home—Both parties contributing to purchase—Separation of parties—Husband's sale of house and furniture—Wife's application for determination of question as to proceeds—No identifiable fund on which order could operate—No power to order payment of money—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (c. 75), s. 17.

In 1918 the husband and wife were married. In 1927 a house was purchased for £720 in the husband's name, and subsequently furniture and a motor car. The wife alleged that she contributed £355 towards these purchases. In March, 1950, the parties separated and the wife obtained a maintenance order against the husband. Later in 1950 the husband sold the house for £2,350, and he also sold the furniture and the motor car. He used part of the proceeds to contribute towards the wife's upkeep, and in 1952 he had between £400 and £500 left. In proceedings commenced by the wife in September, 1952, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, for the determination of all questions as to the proceeds of the sale of the house and contents and of the car, it was ordered that the husband and wife "do share equally in the proceeds of sale". On appeal, HELD: the proceedings were misconceived because there was no property or identifiable fund on which an order under s. 17 could operate, and there was no power under that section to order the payment of money.

(1) Rimmer v. Rimmer, [1952] 2 All E.R. 863; [1953] 1 Q.B. 63.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of GORMAN, J., dated Jan. 21, 1953, dismissing an appeal against an order of Master CLAYTON, dated Dec. 10, 1952, ordering that the wife should share equally in the proceeds of sale of a freehold dwelling-house, 2, Stanley Avenue, New Malden, in the county of Surrey, together with the contents thereof, and in the proceeds of sale of a Morgan motor car.

The wife applied under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, for the determination of all questions between the husband and herself with respect to the proceeds of sale of the dwelling-house and its contents and the title to or possession of or the proceeds of sale of a Morgan three-wheel motor car purchased by the husband in 1929. The house was bought in June, 1927, in the name of the husband for £720, towards which the wife alleged that she advanced £145 from her savings in the Post Office Savings Bank and by the sale of National Savings Certificates, the total purchase price being made up by a government subsidy of £75 and by a mortgage of £500. The wife also alleged that after the purchase she bought furniture to the value of £75, drawing the money from her savings; that she paid all bills, rates, taxes and mortgage repayments, providing £30 in 1931 towards a sum which the husband paid completely to redeem the mortgage; and that in 1928 and 1929 she advanced money to her husband out of which the motor car had been purchased. The husband did not admit the amounts alleged to have been paid by the wife, and denied that she had paid all bills, rates, taxes and mortgage repayments in respect of the property out of her own moneys, and said that in so far as she had made any payments they were out of savings from housekeeping money, or other moneys, provided by him. In March, 1950, the parties separated and on Mar. 9, 1950, a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Wimbledon made an order for the payment of £2 5s. a week maintenance by the husband to the wife, the sum being increased to £3 a week on June 14, 1951. In 1950 the husband sold the house for £2,350, and he also sold the furniture and motor car. In September, 1952, the wife commenced proceedings under the

A Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, on which the master made an order that the proceeds should be shared equally, and GORMAN, J., upheld that order. The husband appealed.

Ogilvie Jones for the husband.

W. H. E. James for the wife.

B LORD GODDARD, C.J.: A summons was taken out by the wife and, following the appropriate procedure, it was referred to the master, who made an order in these terms:

C "It is ordered that the respondent and the applicant do share equally in the proceeds of sale of the freehold dwelling-house known as No. 2, Stanley Avenue, New Malden, in the county of Surrey, together with the contents thereof which have been sold and in the proceeds of sale of one Morgan three-wheel motor car. And it is further ordered that the applicant's solicitor and client costs be taxed by the taxing master in accordance with the rules set out in sched. III to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and be paid out of the total proceeds of sale of the aforementioned property before such proceeds are equally divided as aforesaid."

D The parties were married in 1918, but in March, 1950, they separated and as a result of subsequent proceedings an order was made by the magistrates for the husband to contribute to the wife's support. A house in which they had been living and the furniture were sold by the husband in 1950 and he received the money paid for them. In 1952 the wife took these proceedings, claiming that she was interested in the house. She did provide a certain sum of money towards the purchase of the house in the first instance—that must, I think, be the conclusion to which the master came and which the judge has upheld. She has contributed, she alleges, something like £355 altogether to what I will call the matrimonial establishment, for a house, household furniture, a motor car and so on. The husband sold the house at a largely increased price for £2,350. The learned master made an order that the parties should share that £2,350 in equal shares and the judge upheld the order.

E It seems to this court that the proceedings were entirely misconceived, because the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, under which the wife seeks relief, provides for questions as to the title to or possession of property to be dealt with in a summary way. There was no question here as to the title to or possession of the house. It was, undoubtedly, in the husband's name and he was entitled to sell it. If, when he was about to sell it, the wife had taken proceedings claiming a share in the proceeds of sale, a particular fund, those proceedings might have been appropriate. But the husband, having had the money for two years, has been living on it. He is now an old age pensioner, he has to contribute to his wife's upkeep, and, apparently, he has been using this money to do so. We are told that he has between £400 and £500 left.

F G H It becomes apparent how inappropriate is this order if one asks how it is to be enforced. An order might have been made on a bank in appropriate proceedings to prevent money being paid out, or a solicitor might have been called on by the court to hold money in his hands, but there is no means under s. 17 of giving a money judgment. No judgment has to be given. On proceedings taken by originating summons, I suppose, the court could make a declaration, but when a question as to the title to or possession of property arises the judge " . . . may make such order with respect to the property in dispute, and as to the costs of and consequent on the application as he thinks fit, or may direct such application to stand over from time to time, and any inquiry touching the matters in question to be made in such manner as he shall think fit."

In the case of chattels, or stocks and shares (which are specially mentioned) the judge could, no doubt, order that "that piece of property is to be handed over by the husband" or "these shares standing at present in the husband's name in part or in whole are to be transferred to the wife", and, no doubt, a husband refusing to obey that order could be attached. But I can see nothing in this section which empowers the court to give what is equivalent to a judgment for a sum of money. The wife says: "It is fair that I should have a share in the proceeds of sale of the house". But the proceeds of sale have nearly gone. If the husband had spent more (and he had the legal estate in the money at any rate) he would not have been committing any crime. If he had spent it all there would be nothing on which the order of the court could operate, and there is nothing here on which an order of the court can operate so far as I can see. The order which has been made cannot be implemented in any way. There is no provision in the section for an order made under it being made a rule of court under which execution can issue. I should think it would be most unlikely that the court would enforce an order for the payment of money by way of attachment except in a case where a man was a trustee. The Court of Chancery on a four-day order could attach a man if he did not bring money into court when ordered to do so, but ordinarily a man is not sent to prison for failing to pay money except under what I may call judgment summons procedure. The wife's real remedy in this case might have been to have brought an action under s. 12 of the Act of 1882. I am far from desiring to encourage her to do that, because if she brings an action the court has to proceed on strictly legal principles. This court feels that this order is entirely inappropriate and that these proceedings are misconceived.

The court desires to say that in Rimmer v. Rimmer (1) the court was expressly dealing with a fund which was in existence. No question like this was raised there. There was a fund. The court was deciding how the parties were to share in the fund and the court divided it equally, and I suppose that on that account the judge and master thought in this case it was also right to divide it equally. But, there being no fund here, there is nothing on which this order could operate, and, therefore, it must be discharged.

STOKES v. BENNETT (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), May 5, 6, 7, 21, 1953.]

Income Tax—Annuity—Annuity “free of income tax”—Assessment on annuitant—Payments made by divorced husband under maintenance order—Husband resident abroad—No evidence of deduction of tax—No evidence of husband’s receipt of taxed income—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 21 (1).

A In 1938 a wife obtained a divorce from her husband, a British subject then resident in the United Kingdom, and an order of the court that he should pay her monthly during their joint lives or until further order maintenance at the rate of £22 per month “free of tax”. In 1946 the husband went to reside and work in Brazil. He continued to make the monthly payments to his wife, but there was no evidence that he had deducted tax or that he was in receipt of income which had suffered British income tax, and he did not render to the Inland Revenue authorities an account of payments to the wife and of tax deducted therefrom pursuant to r. 21 (1) of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. Assessments to income tax were made on the wife on the footing that the payments were untaxed income in her hands.

C HELD: (i) if the wife was to be treated as having a sum of untaxed income in her hands, she was directly assessable to tax in respect of it, notwithstanding the rights against the person who should have deducted tax conferred on the Crown by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 26 (1).

D Glamorgan Quarter Sessions v. Wilson ([1910] 1 K.B. 725), applied.
 (ii) the husband’s conduct in paying the exact sum for which the order made provision raised the inference that he had intended to, and had deducted, tax from the gross amount due; as the wife could not sue the husband for the balance of the payments on the footing that those received were gross sums, and as there was no provision in the Act of 1918 that the payee must produce a receipt for tax from the commissioners in order to prove deduction under r. 21 (1) of the All Schedules Rules, the wife must be treated as the recipient of a sum which had borne tax and she could not be further assessed in respect thereof; and it made no difference that the husband was resident abroad, because the income was English income of the wife, a person resident in the United Kingdom, and the husband had in his hands the amount of the tax which he had withheld under statutory authority, in effect as collector for the Crown.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

A wife appealed against assessments made on her under Case III of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the years 1946-47 to 1950-51 inclusive, in respect of payments made to her by her divorced husband, then resident in Brazil, following an order of the Divorce Court that he should pay her maintenance by way of monthly payments of £22 "free of tax". The wife contended that, by virtue of the effect of this order, the annual sums she received were net sums in respect of which she had suffered tax by deduction on payment under either r. 19 (1) or r. 21 (1) of the All Schedules Rules, and that she could not again be subjected to income tax by direct assessment in respect of them. If they fell within r. 19 (1), assessment of the wife was prohibited by that rule, and if within r. 21 (1) she would only be assessable if and to the extent that they were gross sums in her hands from which tax had not been deducted. As the payments were made pursuant to the court order the proper inference was that they were net sums received after deduction of tax, and r. 21 (1) was fully applicable to a person making an annual payment under an order of the High Court of this country, whether or not resident in the United Kingdom. The Crown contended that the wife had failed to show that the payments were payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax under r. 19 (1), and that she had failed to show that tax had been deducted from the payments under r. 21 (1), and that that rule in any event did not apply to payments by a person not resident in the United Kingdom. The commissioners held that, in the absence of evidence, they were unable to say that the payments were made under r. 19 (1), and, if they were made out of profits or gains not charged to British income tax, r. 21 (1) and (2) were inapplicable to a person making such payments not resident in the United Kingdom and they were unable to draw the inference that tax was deducted in making the payments. They held, therefore, that the sums were untaxed income in the hands of the wife and the assessments were correctly made. The wife appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. UPJOHN, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the wife, Mrs. Ann Gordon Stokes, from a decision of the Special Commissioners confirming assessments in respect of the years 1946-47 to 1950-51 inclusive under Case III of sched. D on income received by her under an order of this court. In 1938 the wife obtained a divorce from her husband in the Divorce Division of this court, and on Feb. 1, 1938, an order was made in these terms:

"It is ordered that Stephen Eric Westley Stokes the respondent do pay or cause to be paid to Ann Gordon Stokes the petitioner during their joint lives or until further order, as from the date of the decree absolute herein, to wit, Jan. 24, 1938, maintenance at and after the rate of £22 per month free of tax the said sum to be payable monthly."

I shall call this the 1938 order.

The husband made monthly payments regularly to the wife throughout the relevant years of assessment, and the commissioners have found as a fact that such payments were made pursuant to the order I have just read. The payments were not always of £22 a month for two reasons, first, that the amount payable was reduced by virtue of the Finance Act, 1941, s. 25, and by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 20; secondly, down to 1947 the husband paid rather less than was due from him, and since that date rather more than was due from him, and the wife regarded such excess payments in the latter years to be on account of arrears in the earlier years. For the purposes of argument before me, however, these matters have been ignored, and the case has proceeded on the footing that the husband has regularly made payments of £22 a month pursuant to the order.

In 1946 the husband, a British subject, went abroad to reside and work in Brazil, and he has remained so resident ever since. There was no evidence before the commissioners to show that since 1946 the husband has been in receipt of income which has suffered British income tax. They also found as a fact that the husband had rendered to the British Revenue no account of payments to the wife and of tax deducted therefrom pursuant to r. 21 (1) of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In these circumstances the Crown have made assessments on the wife in respect of the sums received by her, and the commissioners have upheld these assessments, holding that the sums received by her were untaxed income in her hands. The question is whether they were right.

The 1938 order was made in what was then the common form following certain principles laid down by SIR HENRY DUKE, P., in Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (1) ([1922] P. 282), principles which incidentally have since been attacked and overthrown: see Spilsbury v. Spofforth (2) ([1937] 4 All E.R. 488), and Wallis v. Wallis (3) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 293). Both sides agree, however, that, having regard to Spilsbury v. Spofforth (2) and the earlier case of Burroughes v. Abbott (4), an order in that form is to be construed as an order to pay a gross sum of such amount as after deducting income tax for the time being payable in respect thereof will leave the clear monthly sum of £22. The case has been argued before me by both sides in two stages, first, by considering the position on the footing that the husband remained resident at all material times in the United Kingdom, and, secondly, by considering how that is affected by his residence abroad, and it will be convenient to follow that course in this judgment.

At the first stage it is clear that, in making the payments, the husband was entitled to deduct tax if he was paying the annuity wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax, and was compelled to do so if he was paying the annuity otherwise than out of such profits or gains. That is the scheme of collection embodied in r. 19 and r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. I need not read those rules, for VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Allchin v. Coulthard (5) put the matter succinctly ([1943] 2 All E.R. 354):

"The three heads under which the existing scheme of collection of income tax embodied in rr. 19 and 21 may be stated are as follows:—(a) A person liable to pay any yearly interest of money, annuity or any other annual payment to a recipient is not entitled to deduct this payment in arriving at his profits or gains to be assessed and charged with income tax. If the amount is payable and paid out of his profits or gains, he is assessed on a sum which includes such payments, while the recipient is not directly assessed in respect of the amount at all. Consequently, the Crown gets from the payer both the tax at the standard rate which would otherwise be due from the recipient of the annual payment and the tax due from himself in respect of what is left of his profits and gains after the payment is made. (b) If the annual payment is payable and paid out of his profits and gains, the payer is entitled to deduct from the payment he makes to the recipient income tax at the current rate, and the recipient is bound to allow the deduction upon receipt of the residue and to treat the payer as acquitted of liability to him in respect of the amount thus deducted. By this means, the payer recoups himself for the tax which he has paid or will pay on the annual payment. (c) If and in so far as the annual payment is not payable and paid out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person making the payment is bound to deduct from it income tax at the current rate and to account to the Crown for the amount deducted. In effect, the payer in such a case acts as collector for the Crown of the tax due from the recipient. The requirement that the recipient must allow the deduction and treat the payer as acquitted of liability in respect of this amount is not repeated in r. 21, but must be implied."

It was contended on behalf of the Crown that these monthly payments of £22 must be taken to be gross sums, because it is said that, having regard to the proper construction to be put on the 1938 order, the husband can comply with it in three ways: (a) by paying £22 and producing evidence that he has paid it wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax, (b) by paying £22 and producing evidence that he has accounted for and paid tax to the Revenue, or (c) by paying £44 (assuming tax to be at 10s. in the £) cash to the wife. Then it is said that the wife cannot prove that the requirements of (a) or (b) are satisfied, so that she can still sue for the gross sum of £44 each month, and in the meantime she must be taken to have received £22 on account of a gross sum of £44, and in respect of this gross sum she is directly assessable to tax. The wife admits that she cannot prove that the husband made a deduction pursuant to r. 19 (1), so I need not further consider that particular matter.

It will be convenient next to consider the validity of the last step in the Crown's argument, viz., assuming the wife to have received a gross sum, can she be directly assessed to tax? A gross sum of this nature is admittedly chargeable to tax under para. 1 (b) of sched. D and falls within Case III. Counsel for the Crown pointed out that, while the equivalent of r. 19 has been present in income tax legislation from the earliest times, yet, when payments were made otherwise than out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax, the gross sum had to be paid, and, until 1888, an assessment was made directly on the recipient under the earlier taxing provisions corresponding to r. 1 of the Miscellaneous Rules Applicable to sched. D. This was altered by s. 24 (3) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, which contained provisions (substantially re-enacted in r. 21 (1) of the Act of 1918) compelling the payer to deduct tax and making the tax deducted from the annuity a debt due from the person deducting the tax to the Crown. The Finance Act, 1927, s. 26 (1), improved the machinery of collection by enabling the Crown to make an assessment on the person who deducted the tax and giving them ancillary rights to enforce collection against him. But, said counsel for the Crown, the power to make an assessment directly on the recipient remained. He relied on Glamorgan Quarter Sessions v. Wilson (6) in support of that view. Counsel for the wife challenged the binding authority of that case having regard to the passage in LORD SIMON's opinion in the South Shields case (5) which I have read and to the alteration of the law in 1927. In my judgment, the Finance Act, 1927, only improved the machinery but was not intended to alter any principle of collection, and the Glamorgan case (6) is a direct decision on the point, not directly overruled by anything in the South Shields case (5), and is binding on me. I would point out, however, that BRAY, J., in the last paragraph of his judgment ([1910] 1 K.B. 735) made it clear that he was only deciding that a gross sum was chargeable by direct assessment on the recipient. If, therefore, on the true view of the facts of this case and of the law applicable thereto, the wife is to be treated as having a sum of untaxed income in her hands she is, in my view, directly assessable to tax.

I turn, to the submission of the Crown which (omitting consideration of any r. 19 payment) may be further analysed in this way, that the payment of £22 must be treated as being intended to be payment on account of an obligation to pay £44, unless it be proved that the husband has in fact (i) deducted tax, and (ii) accounted for and paid the tax deducted to the Crown. On the first point I was referred to a decision of DENNING, J., in Hemsworth

v. Hemsworth (7). The report is very short. It was an action between husband and wife, and turned solely on the question whether as between payer and payee the husband could claim that he had made a deduction under r. 19 (where, of course, the right to deduct is optional) without notifying the wife that he had done so and without providing her with a calculation showing the amount deducted. In that case it is to be noted that the obligation was to pay a gross sum, and the net sum payable would vary according to the rate of tax, so
A (especially where there were heavy arrears extending over a number of years) it would be right to compel the husband to make the calculation of the net sum due and notify the wife accordingly. Whether that would be necessary in a case such as this, where the net sum is fixed and the gross sum varies according to the rate of tax, I need not consider. What was also important in that case was that, down to 1940, the husband had paid the wife the gross
B sum due without exercising his right to deduct tax. On a consideration of all the facts, the learned judge came to the conclusion that, in making several comparatively small payments on account, the husband must be taken to have made gross payments.

The facts of that case are far removed from the present, and I do not derive any assistance from it. No general principle is there laid down, except possibly
C in relation to r. 19 (1). The facts of this case are that the husband made, more or less exactly, payments of the net sums prescribed by the order, and, in my judgment, the only permissible inference to be drawn from that is that he was intending to and did deduct tax from the gross amount which was due from him on the proper construction of the order. There is no magic in the word
D "deduct". It merely means that less is paid and the balance is retained if r. 19 is applicable. If r. 21 (1) is applicable the balance unpaid, being the amount representing the tax, is or ought to be paid to the Crown.

I turn, then, to the last point of the Crown, that, whatever was intended by the parties, payment of the monthly sum must be treated as a gross sum unless and until it be proved that the amount has been accounted for and paid to the Crown. That is a question of construction of r. 21. Sub-rule (1) provides that,
E on payment of the annuity, the payer shall deduct the amount of tax. Sub-rule (2) provides that where any such payment is made the payer "shall forthwith" deliver an account to the commissioners and so on. The commissioners have wide powers of collection of the tax from the payer, the payee has none. The wife cannot sue for the balance on the footing that she has been paid a
F gross sum, because she will be met with a defence under r. 21 (1), that rule being construed in the light of the implication to be read therein; see per VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 354) in the passage I have read from the South Shields case (5). Moreover, there is nothing in the Act which entitles the payee to say the payer has deducted tax if, but only if, he can produce a receipt from the commissioners. In my judgment, the construction propounded by the Crown strikes at the whole scheme of collection of tax in these cases,
G and I see no warranty for it.

In my view, if I am right in coming to the conclusion that the wife is to be treated as the recipient of a sum from which tax has been deducted by the payer, that sum is, so far as she is concerned, to be treated as a sum which has borne tax, and no further assessment in respect of tax can be raised on her.
H Collection of the tax which has been deducted is a matter entirely between the Crown and the payer. I reach the end of the first stage by concluding that, if the husband were still resident in this country, the Crown's claim would fail.

At the second stage, how is the matter affected by the continued residence of the husband in Brazil? The Crown submit, and the commissioners accepted the view, that where the payer is resident abroad then r. 21 has no application. Consequently it was said (and on the footing that r. 21 (1) does not apply, rightly said) that the husband's obligation was, on the proper construction of the order, an obligation to pay the gross sum provided by the order and not the net sum, so that the monthly payments of £22 must be taken to be payments on account of the gross sums due which have not borne tax in the hands of the recipient. The whole question is: Does r. 21 (1) apply? As a matter of construction of the Act it seems to be clear, and, indeed, the contrary was not seriously pressed, that r. 21 (1) is as applicable to a person resident abroad as to one resident in the United Kingdom, and it was conceded that r. 19 (1) was so applicable. It was said, however, that the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the words of LORD WRENBURY ([1926] A.C. 56) in Whitney v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (8),

" . . . has nothing to do with the foreign income of one who is not a British subject and who is not resident here."

A little later he says (ibid.):

"The Act nowhere purports to tax income which is neither derived from property in the United Kingdom nor income received by a person resident in the United Kingdom."

Therefore, it is said, to apply r. 21 (1) to a person resident abroad (having, as I must assume, no English income of his own) would conflict with the above principle and would result in the taxation of a person wholly outside the scope and ambit of the Income Tax Acts.

I think there is a short answer to that. This income is the income of the wife, a person resident in this country, and it arises under an order of this court. There is no foreign element about the income at all. The husband has in his hands tax on this English income which he has withheld solely in reliance on an imperial statute. He holds that income, as LORD SIMON said in the South Shields case (5) in the passage I have already quoted ([1943] 2 All E.R. 354), in effect as collector for the Crown of tax due from the recipient. That is, he is an agent bound to account to his principal. The Crown may not be able to recover it in a foreign court, as it would be an action to enforce our revenue laws, but there can be no doubt of the matter in principle. The Whitney case (8) also shows that, even if the husband were an alien, which he is not, an assessment could be made on him directly in his own name at his address abroad for tax in respect of English income. In my judgment, the husband having tax on English income in his hands as an agent can be in no better position.

It follows, in my judgment, that the claim of the Crown fails. The appeal must be allowed and the assessments discharged. The Crown must pay the wife's costs. The wife is legally aided, and her costs must be taxed as between solicitor and client for the purposes of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

Appeal allowed.

In the Estate of LINDLEY (deceased). LINDLEY v. LINDLEY.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), May 6, 1953.]

Intestacy—Grant of administration—Administration pendente lite—Number of administrators—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 160 (1), s. 163 (1).

By s. 160 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925: "Probate or administration shall not be granted to more than four persons in respect of the same property, and administration shall, if there is a minority or if a life interest arises under the will or intestacy, be granted either to a trust corporation, with or without an individual, or to not less than two individuals". By s. 163 (1): "Where any legal proceedings . . . for obtaining . . . any grant, are pending, the High Court may grant administration of the estate of the deceased to an administrator, who shall have all the rights and powers of a general administrator, other than the right of distributing the residue of the estate, and every such administrator shall be subject to the immediate control of the court and act under its direction". On a motion for the appointment of one administrator pendente lite under s. 163 (1), HELD: section 163 (1) was not controlled by s. 160 (1), which regulated the grant of general administration, and, therefore, notwithstanding the possibility of a life or a minority interest arising, a grant to one administrator could be made under s. 163 (1); there were no special circumstances requiring the appointment of two administrators; and, accordingly, the grant would be made to one administrator as sought.

FOR THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (CONSOLIDATION) ACT, 1925, s. 160 (1), s. 163 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 776, 779.

MOTION by the plaintiff for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite of the estate of Edgar Ivor Lindley, deceased.

The plaintiff, the widow of the deceased, claimed a grant of letters of administration of the deceased's estate. The defendant, by his defence and counterclaim, claimed to be the residuary legatee named by the deceased in a will dated Mar. 16, 1952, and sought to set up that will as the last will and testament of the deceased. The will could not be found, but it was alleged to have modified an earlier will dated Feb. 2, 1952. In the event of there being an intestacy, as alleged by the plaintiff, a life interest would arise in favour of the plaintiff as widow and a further interest in favour of an infant during minority.

John Latey for the plaintiff.

Hollins for the defendant.

WALLINGTON, J.: In this case I am invited to appoint John William Redman as administrator pendente lite of the real and personal estate of the deceased pursuant to the provisions of s. 163 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

A point has been raised whether there should be two administrators and not only one by reason of the fact that there is a possibility of a life or a minority interest arising during the course of, or resulting from, the proceedings in the action. I can well imagine that there may be cases of applications under s. 163 (1) which, owing to their circumstances, may call for the appointment of a trust company or two administrators either because of some special powers which the court may think it right to confer on the administrator pendente lite, or, possibly, for other reasons, but, in my opinion, there are no such circumstances in this case. There is a possibility, but no more than a possibility, of a life or minority interest arising, but no circumstances exist which, in my view, make it necessary for me to consider the appointment of more than one administrator. In my opinion, s. 163 (1) is not controlled by s. 160 (1) of the Act of 1925, which regulates the grant of general administration. Accordingly, I appoint John William Redman as administrator pendente lite.

ADSETT v. K. & L. STEELFOUNDERS & ENGINEERS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), May 15, 1953.] B

Factory—Removal of dust—“All practicable measures” to be taken—Provision of exhaust appliances—Standard of duty—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 47 (1). C

From July, 1940, to Oct. 22, 1944, the plaintiff was employed in the defendants' steel foundry as a labourer whose duty it was to shovel dry sand, which was tipped out of moulds, through a grid on to a conveyor belt several feet below. A considerable amount of dust rose through the grid when the sand fell on to the belt, and in January, 1942, the defendants installed a new type of extractor plant under the grid to draw off the dust. In August, 1949, the plaintiff was certified to be suffering from pneumoconiosis and he was found as a fact to have contracted it by November, 1943, in the course of his employment with the defendants. In an action against his employers for breach of their duty under s. 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, to take all practicable measures to protect their employees against inhalation of dust, D

HELD: in deciding whether all practicable measures had been taken to protect the plaintiff against the inhalation of dust, regard must be had to the state of knowledge at the material time, and, particularly, of that of scientific experts; on the facts the defendants had taken all measures which were practicable before and in 1942; and, therefore, they were not in breach of their statutory duty. Case referred to:

(1) Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 387; 172 L.T. 285; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., dated Dec. 8, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 97.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants at their steel foundry at Letchworth for various periods between 1940 and 1948. From July, 1940, to Oct. 22, 1944, the relevant period for the purpose of this case, he was engaged in alternate spells of two hours each in mixing dried sand, fresh sand, and a mixture known as bentonite in a hopper, and in shovelling mainly dry sand which was tipped out of moulds through a two-inch grid or grating on to a conveyor belt several feet below. A considerable amount of dust rose through the grating when the sand fell on the conveyor belt, and in January, 1942, the defendants installed an extractor plant underneath the grid which drew off the dust. In August, 1949, the plaintiff was certified by the pneumoconiosis board to be suffering from pneumoconiosis, and he was found as a fact to have contracted it in the course of his employment with the defendants by November, 1943. In an action against his employers for damages for negligence and breach G H of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 47 (1), it was contended, inter alia, that the defendants had failed to comply with the requirements of that sub-section that:

" . . . all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust . . . and . . . where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained, as near as possible to the point of origin of the dust . . ."

A PARKER, J., held that there had been no negligence or breach of statutory duty and gave judgment for the defendants.

Croom-Johnson for the plaintiff.

P. M. O'Connor for the defendants.

B SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the plaintiff has limited the appeal to one point under s. 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, namely, that the defendants had failed in their duty under that sub-section which provides:

C "In every factory in which, in connection with any process carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its accumulating in any workroom, and in particular, where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained, as D near as possible to the point of origin of the dust or fume or other impurity, so as to prevent it entering the air of any workroom."

By January, 1942, the defendants had installed a dust extractor of a novel kind in that it was placed under the grid to take the dust away as far as possible. That plant was in operation during the greater part of three years before the end of the plaintiff's first period of work with the defendants, i.e., July, 1940, to October, 1944. It is now said by the plaintiff: "You ought to have done
E it earlier, and if you had done it by July, 1940, when I went to work for you, I should not now have been suffering from this disease."

The question for consideration is whether on the facts the defendants are in breach of their duty under s. 47 (1). The word "practicable" appears in each limb of the sub-section, and discussion on its meaning took place both
F before PARKER, J., and in this court. The learned judge said that the real question was what the word "practicable" meant. Counsel for the plaintiff referred to WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY where "practicable" is defined as "possible to be accomplished with known means or resources." LORD GODDARD in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (1) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 389), adopted a definition in the OXFORD DICTIONARY, namely, "capable of being carried out
G in action" or "feasible."

The complaint made here is in respect of the period from July, 1940, when the plaintiff became employed, until the installation of the extractor in January, 1942. The impression to be gained from one passage in the learned judge's judgment is that by reason of complaints made by the plaintiff and another employee the extractor was installed within a fortnight of those complaints.
H I think it is clear that that does not accurately state the position. The defendants had been in the forefront of the campaign to have a good factory; no other factory owners had thought of installing an extractor below the grid before this time and it has worked well. The ordinary kind of dust extractor is set close to the place where the dust rises and draws it off, and it is conceded that that type of extractor would have been, if not impossible, certainly impracticable in the defendants' foundry. Counsel for the plaintiff submits, however, that it was practicable to have a dust extractor below the grid before the date on which it was installed, that it would have been practicable to put in there when the grid system was installed in 1938, and, if it was practicable and it was not done, then the defendants are in breach of their statutory duty.

I am unable to accept that submission. It seems to me that you must have regard to the position which existed at that time. The plaintiff started work with the defendants during the war. Before and during the war the defendants did all they could to make their foundry fit for their men to work in. I realise that that is not the test under s. 47 (1) of the Act, and that the question is whether they had taken all practicable measures, but it must be remembered that, until the defendants discovered the system of installing an extractor under the grid, there was no such system in existence. Can it, then, be said that the system which they discovered was practicable long before such discovery? The plaintiff's expert witness said that the extractor below the grid was an improvement and was the only one of its kind he had seen. Through the instrumentality of someone who could not be called as a witness, they installed this kind of device which is of particular benefit in their foundry and may well prove a benefit in others, although, so far as I can find from the evidence, it has not been adopted generally. It would appear to be hard on the defendants if, in those circumstances, they were made liable for not discovering sooner something which, for the benefit of the community, they discovered in 1941.

I now go back to the question: What were the measures which it was practicable for the defendants to take in 1940 or 1941? It is argued by the plaintiff that it was practicable for the defendants to install the new extractor plant because they ought to have thought of it earlier. I do not think that that is the right test. In deciding whether all practicable measures were taken one must have regard to the state of knowledge at the material time, and, particularly, to the knowledge of scientific experts. I find it impossible to say on my view of this sub-section that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

BLACKMAN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 7, 1953.]

Negligence—Invitee—Railway station—Passenger slipping on patch of oil—Duty owed by Railway Executive.

AS TO DUTY TO INVITEES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 600-609, paras. 851-858; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 35-45, Nos. 208-281.

APPEAL from an order of HILBERY, J., dated Dec. 3, 1952, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 4, in which he gave judgment for the defendants in an action for damages for negligence.

The defendants, the Railway Executive, were the occupiers of Paddington Station. Part of the station was used for the loading and unloading of mail vans, for mail bags and trolleys, and for standing barrows used to convey mail bags to platforms, but there was nothing to show that passengers should not go on that part. On the removal of certain of the barrows the foreman on duty noticed a patch of oil which had dripped on the ground and had previously been hidden by the barrows. He at once tried to stop people passing that way and shouted to a trolley driver to get sawdust and put it on the oil. The plaintiff, while crossing that part of the railway station, did not hear the shout of the foreman, and he did not see her, and she slipped on the oil, fell, and was injured. The defendants denied negligence, and HILBERY, J., gave judgment in their favour. The plaintiff appealed.

Wooll, Q.C., and F. L. Clark for the plaintiff.

N. Lawson for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., said the learned judge admittedly applied the correct principle of law to the matter, namely, that it was the duty of the Railway Executive to keep their platforms reasonably safe so as to prevent a passenger meeting with an unexpected danger. It was utterly impossible to prevent a patch of oil getting on the platform or to prevent some slippery place occurring. The most the Railway Executive could do when they knew oil was on the platform was to take reasonable steps to prevent the public slipping on it. What more could be done than for the foreman porter to stand and shout to people to go the other way, warning them against coming that way until sawdust was procured, he did not know. The learned judge came to the conclusion after hearing the evidence that the defendants had taken all reasonable steps to avoid danger to passengers. It was impossible for the Court of Appeal to interfere with that finding unless they came to the conclusion that the judge had applied either too high or too low a test in some way so as to make his judgment on that point obviously wrong. They must not confuse questions of fact and questions of law. Once the standard of duty was laid down correctly, whether the Railway Executive took adequate and reasonable steps was purely a question of fact. The learned judge found, and rightly found, that the Railway Executive did what was reasonable in the circumstances. The appeal must be dismissed.

BIRKETT and HODSON, L.J.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), March 30, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Insanity—Questions put to medical witness as to appellant's state of mind.

On the trial of the appellant on a charge of murder the defence raised was that of insanity, and a doctor who was called for the defence was asked in cross-examination whether the appellant's conduct immediately after the murder indicated to him that at the time of the murder the appellant knew (i) the nature of the act he was doing and (ii) that his conduct was contrary to the law of the land. The answer to both these questions was in the affirmative. On appeal, it was contended that the questions were inadmissible on the ground that they were tantamount to asking the doctor to express an opinion on the very issue which the jury had to decide.

HELD: the questions had been rightly admitted.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted before STREATFEILD, J., at Nottinghamshire Assizes of the murder of Harriett Ann Eyles and was sentenced to death.

G. Terrell for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted before STREATFEILD, J., at Nottinghamshire Assizes of murder. The case was one in which the defence set up the plea of insanity, the onus of proving which is on the prisoner. The medical witnesses for both the defence and the prosecution were agreed that at any rate at the time of the trial and probably previously the appellant was suffering from a disease of the mind, a particular form of paranoia.

The test of insanity, when it is sought to establish it as an excuse for a criminal act, according to the answers the judges gave in M'Naghten's Case (1), which were adopted by the House of Lords, is whether or not the accused person knew the nature and quality of the act he was doing. If he did not, that establishes insanity. If he did, one must then go further and ask whether he knew at the time of its commission that the act was wrong—wrong in the sense of contrary to law, not wrong in the sense of contrary to morals. In the present case the appellant, after a savage attack on the murdered person, went to a police station, gave himself up, said he was giving himself up for murder, and gave a detailed account of what he had done and how he had done it. A medical witness who was called for the defence, was asked in cross-examination:

“ You remember that I asked you the question whether the accused's conduct immediately after this incident would indicate to you that he knew the nature of the act that he was committing and your reply was ‘ Yes ’. That is so, is it not ? A.—Yes. Q.—Would his conduct immediately after indicate equally that he knew his conduct was contrary to the law of the land. A.—Yes.”

Counsel for the appellant has submitted that those questions were inadmissible. Whatever fine distinctions may have been drawn in days before or soon after M'Naghten's Case (1), we can only say that no member of the court has ever heard an objection being taken to such questions as those. Moreover, if the objection prevailed, it would, as it seems to us, put an insuperable difficulty in the way of the defence whenever they were trying to establish insanity. For instance, if a medical witness could not be asked whether the defendant's conduct immediately after the act in respect of which he was charged indicated that he knew his conduct was contrary to the law of the land, the doctor being prepared to answer "No", it would be a great hardship on the defendant who was setting up a plea of insanity if the doctor was not to be allowed to answer that question. It seems to the court that that is essentially a question that may be asked and answered. Counsel for the appellant has referred to a large number of cases in which the court has set out what is the right question and issue, and he has relied particularly on the judgment in R. v. Francis (2) of ALDERSON, B., who evidently had not approved of the decision in M'Naghten's Case (1), where he said (4 Cox C.C. 58):

"The proper mode is to ask what are the symptoms of insanity, or to take particular facts, and, assuming them to be true, to ask whether they indicate insanity on the part of the prisoner."

When the learned judge says "insanity", he is using the word in the sense that it is understood in criminal law as an excuse for crime. Therefore, the question asked in the present case falls exactly within what the learned judge says is admissible because, to expand the question it is this: "Does the fact that the appellant went immediately to the police station, gave himself up, and wrote out a full description of the crime indicate to you insanity on his part, that is to say, insanity within the M'Naghten Rules, that he did not know that what he had done was contrary to law."

That is quite enough to dispose of this case, and this court does not propose to go into all the cases cited because, in their opinion, the matter is quite clear and it would be to introduce a great deal of confusion and injustice to an insane prisoner if we were to give effect to the argument. This appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. WILSHER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hallett and Donovan, JJ.),
June 9, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Sentence on offender already serving sentence of corrective training—Further offence committed while offender released on licence.

On Jan. 27, 1953, when the applicant had been committed for trial at assizes on charges of office breaking, he was convicted at the Central Criminal Court of a similar offence and was there sentenced to four years' corrective training. On Feb. 20 he was convicted at assizes and was sentenced to two years' corrective training to run consecutively to the sentence passed at the Central Criminal Court.

HELD: the sentence passed at the assizes was a correct and proper sentence.

Per curiam: When an offender who has been sentenced to a term of corrective training and released on licence commits a further offence while he is on licence, a sentence of imprisonment should be imposed in respect of the further offence unless the Prison Commissioners recommend the offender for a further sentence of corrective training, in which case the court can exercise its discretion to pass either a sentence of imprisonment or one of corrective training.

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Talbot, [1953] 1 All E.R. 340; 117 J.P. 119.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against conviction.

On Jan. 27, 1953, the applicant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court of shopbreaking and was sentenced to four years' corrective training. At that time he had been committed for trial at Chelmsford Assizes, where, on Feb. 20, 1953, he was convicted of office breaking, larceny, office breaking with intent to commit a felony, and causing grievous bodily harm to a police constable, and was sentenced by HALLETT, J., to two years' corrective training to run consecutively to the sentence passed at the Central Criminal Court.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued: There is no ground for interfering with the conviction of the applicant. HALLETT, J., having heard that the applicant had been sentenced at the Central Criminal Court to a sentence of corrective training, felt himself to be in a difficulty because this court has said in R. v. Talbot (1) that it is undesirable to pass a sentence of imprisonment when an offender who is undergoing a sentence of corrective training is brought before the court for a further offence which has not been tried at the time he received the sentence of corrective training, because that would mean that the moment he finishes his corrective training he will have to undergo imprisonment, and that, very likely, would do away with any good he may have received from the corrective training. In the present case, the applicant having received that sentence of corrective training, the learned judge thought—in our opinion, quite rightly—that the only thing to do was to add some period to his term of corrective training, and so he passed a sentence of two years' corrective training which would mean that the applicant would serve at least an additional year because it was to follow consecutively on the sentence that he was already serving.

So far as that is concerned, the court entirely approve, but it occasionally happens that when offenders who have been sentenced to corrective training are released on licence, they commit offences while they are on licence. Since the coming into force of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 56 (1), where an offender earns a remission of imprisonment, the sentence comes to an end. The position is not the same in the case of corrective training, or, as a matter of fact, preventive detention. If an offender has been sentenced to corrective training he can be released on licence, but he is liable to be recalled if he commits an offence while he is on licence. Certain recorders have recently found difficulty in dealing with cases where offenders have committed offences while they are on licence. They are told that the Prison Commissioners will recall the offenders, and very often the commissioners report that the offenders in question have shown that they receive no benefit from corrective training and that they do not recommend them for a further sentence of corrective training. The court thinks that in a case where an offender commits an offence while on licence a sentence of imprisonment should be imposed unless the Prison Commissioners report to the court that they think that a further period of corrective training may be of use. Then the court can exercise its discretion whether to pass a sentence of imprisonment or one of corrective training, but, unless there is that report, the only way the case can be dealt with is by passing a sentence of imprisonment. In the present case there is no application for leave to appeal against sentence, and, therefore, it is not necessary to say more than that the application for leave to appeal against conviction is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

LEOLGA COMPANIA DE NAVIGACION v. JOHN GLYNN & SON, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), May 14, 15, 22, 1953.]

Shipping—Charterparty—"Lawful merchandise"—Cargo not capable of being lawfully discharged at destination.

Under a charterparty dated Dec. 12, 1951, a vessel was "to be employed in lawful trades for the conveyance of lawful merchandise between good and safe ports or places within" certain limits. The charterers were "to be responsible for loss or damage caused to steamer or owners by goods being loaded contrary to the terms of" the charter, but it was contemplated that the vessel might load explosives or other dangerous cargo. The vessel loaded cargo at Malta, Tripoli, Benghazi and Tobruk which contained ammunition and other explosive war stores consigned to Adabiya for the British forces in Egypt. She called at Port Said and was "blacklisted" by the Egyptian authorities there in accordance with a letter dated Nov. 1, 1951, by which the Egyptian authorities prohibited vessels from discharging and/or loading cargoes belonging to the British army at any place in Egypt except Alexandria, Port Said and Suez. The charterers, by their agents, had received a copy of this letter before they had entered into the charterparty. The vessel proceeded to Adabiya where she discharged her cargo and loaded a cargo of military stores. Before she sailed her propelling machinery broke down, and, due to her being "blacklisted", the Egyptian authorities refused to allow repairs to be carried out on the spot. She was thus immobilised for thirty days while the necessary repairs were done, that period being twenty-six days longer than the repairs would otherwise have taken.

HELD: to be "lawful merchandise" goods loaded under the charterparty must not only be such as could be loaded without breach of the law in force at the port of loading, but must also be such as could lawfully be carried and discharged at the port of discharge; as the cargo in the present case could not be lawfully discharged at the port of discharge it was not "lawful merchandise" within the terms of the charterparty; and, therefore, the charterers were in breach of the charterparty and liable to the shipowners in damages.

SPECIAL CASE stated by umpire.

By a time charterparty dated Dec. 12, 1951, on the Baltimore 1920 form, the charterers, John Glynn & Son, Ltd., chartered the vessel s.s. Dodecanese, owned by the shipowners, Leolga Compania de Navigacion, for a period of about three months. The charterparty contained (inter alia) the following clauses: C

"1 . . . Steamer to be employed in lawful trades for the conveyance of lawful merchandise between good and safe ports or places within the following limits: Full Mediterranean and Red Sea . . . 10. In the event of loss of time caused by drydocking or by other necessary measures to maintain the efficiency of steamer, or by . . . breakdown of machinery, damage to hull, or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, hire to cease from commencement of such loss of time until steamer is again in efficient state to resume service . . . 12. . . Charterers to be responsible for loss or damage caused to steamer or owners by goods being loaded contrary to the terms of this charter . . . 31. In the event of explosives being shipped it is agreed that the charterers are to supply at their expense the necessary magazine in order to comply with Board of Trade regulations. 32. Dangerous cargo may be carried in accordance with Board of Trade rules . . ."

On Dec. 20, 1951, the vessel was delivered to the charterers at Malta. Cargo, some of which consisted of ammunition, fused shells, and other fuses, was loaded there and at Tripoli, Benghazi and Tobruk. On Jan. 14, 1952, the vessel arrived at Port Said where she was boarded by the Egyptian authorities who made an entry in Arabic in her logbook that she was "blacklisted" under Egyptian law in accordance with a letter, No. 9443, which had been sent by the Egyptian authorities to the charterers' agent on Nov. 1, 1951, stating, inter alia, that any cargo or materials consigned to the British forces in Egypt were not allowed to be discharged without obtaining special permission from the Customs and that it was prohibited for vessels to berth for the discharge and/or loading of cargoes belonging to the British army at any place in Egypt except the ports of Alexandria, Port Said and Suez. The vessel then proceeded through the Suez Canal to Adabiya where she discharged her cargo. After discharge she loaded a cargo of military stores, including ammunition, at Port Tewfik for Aquaba, and was due to sail on Jan. 31, 1952. On Jan. 30, 1952, however, she suffered a breakdown of her propelling machinery which immobilised her till it could be repaired, and on Feb. 4, 1952, the charterers' agent notified the master, by letter, that his ship must be considered as "off hire" from Jan. 30, 1952. The Egyptian authorities refused to allow the repairs to be effected on the spot owing to the fact that the vessel had been blacklisted, but the master had the defective part repaired in Cairo and the vessel eventually sailed on Mar. 2, 1952. The shipowners claimed £2,131 12s. 11d. being the amount of hire from Jan. 31, 1952, to Mar. 1, 1952, less four days hire representing the time which would normally have been spent in effecting repairs. They also put in an alternative claim for damages for breach of the charterparty amounting to the same figure. In accordance with the terms of the charterparty the parties appointed arbitrators, and they, being unable to agree, appointed an umpire, who, on Dec. 11, 1952, found that the charterers were in breach of the charterparty, holding, on the authority of Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1), that government stores (armaments, ammunition, etc.) were not "lawful merchandise", and that the shipowners were entitled to recover the £2,131 12s. 11d.

Eustace Roskill, Q.C., and Bateson for the charterers.

Sir Robert Aske, Q.C., and M. R. Holman for the shipowners.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 22. PILCHER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: One of the difficulties in the case arises from the fact that the umpire has not set out some of the facts with any great precision. On the face of the award the umpire has found, subject to the opinion of the court, that the charterers committed a breach of contract, taking the view, on the authority of Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1) that government stores (ammunition, etc.) were not lawful merchandise. He has assessed the damages payable by the charterers in respect of the breach of contract on the basis of the hire payable by them, but withheld, throughout the period during which the vessel was delayed, namely, thirty days, less four days, which was agreed by the parties as being the time in which the repairs to the defective part would have been effected but for the refusal of the Egyptian authorities to allow repairs to be done. Another difficulty in the case has arisen because of the umpire's reference to Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1). It was urged with some force by counsel for the charterers that that case is no authority for the bald proposition that government stores, including ammunition, are not covered by the words "lawful merchandise". This was conceded by counsel for the shipowners. In my view, it is quite clear that Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1) is no authority for the proposition for which it would appear, on the face of the award, that it was invoked by the umpire. The report of the case is not satisfactory, and, at the most, it is only an authority on "usage" applied to its own particular facts.

In these circumstances the charterers contend that the award is bad on its face and should be set aside. Counsel for the shipowners pointed out, however, that the umpire states the question for the decision of the court in the widest possible terms, namely, whether on the facts and the construction of the charterparty the shipowners are, or are not, entitled to the damages which he has awarded them. Counsel contended that, on the wide question submitted, it was open to this court, if the necessary facts have been found by the umpire, to consider not only whether there has been a breach of contract by the charterers on the grounds found by the umpire, but whether, on the facts found, the charterers have been guilty of any breach of contract at all which entitles the shipowners to claim damages.

On the broad question submitted for the opinion of the court I have no doubt that, if sufficient facts have been stated by the umpire to enable the court to arrive at a conclusion, it is open to me to consider whether the charterers have, in the circumstances, been guilty of any breach of the charterparty, and, if necessary, also to consider the question which is necessarily bound up with this point, namely, whether the charterers were entitled, in the circumstances, to treat the vessel as off hire and to withhold hire under the off hire clause. In this connection I need only refer to certain passages in the judgment of BANKES, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., in Hudson's Bay Co. v. Domingo Mumburu Sociedad Anonima (2), one of the points in the case being whether or not it was open to the parties, on the statement by the umpire of the question for the decision of the court, to argue a point which apparently had not been dealt with or decided by the umpire. BANKES, L.J., said (10 Lloyd L.R. 478):

" . . . the Special Case takes the form that the umpire states the facts as he finds them, and then asks the court not a question as to a specific point of law, but he asks the court generally to say whether having regard to those facts as found by him the one party or the other was in the right. So I think it was open to the shipowner to raise the point."

ATKIN, L.J., said (ibid.):

"Now the first question is: Is that open to them? For the reasons given by my Lord, I think that that point is open to them, though, in fact, it was not taken before the umpire where apparently the arbitration seems to have been conducted before two arbitrators and the umpire, and we are not told whether legal advisers were present or not. It seems to me that, where an umpire states a Case in the form that subject to any questions of law he finds the facts so-and-so, and awards so-and-so, the parties are entitled to take any questions of law that arise upon those facts; and I think it is a good thing that that should be made clear. I am not at all sure that by far the most important part of our decision in this case to the public at large is that part of the decision and not that part that immediately concerns the construction of this charterparty."

In common parlance, the real point in this case is very shortly summarised by the umpire in para. 7 of the award, where he says this:

"This case turns upon the question as to who is responsible for the time used doing repairs, which repairs were inordinately delayed on account of the vessel being blacklisted by the Egyptian authorities owing to her having or having had on board military stores, cartridges, bombs, shells, etc. for the British forces in Egypt."

I start with this general proposition, that, prima facie, the charterers' obligation to pay hire is continuous. If a charterer withholds hire, purporting to do so under the off hire clause, it is for him to establish facts which entitle him to do so: see Board of Trade v. Temperley Steam Shipping Co., Ltd. (3). Correspondingly, if the shipowner alleges a breach of contract he must prove it. In the present case the charterers allege that the vessel was off hire within the words of cl. 10 of the charterparty throughout the whole month during which she was held up at Adabiya, and they deny that they have been guilty of any breach of contract. They further say that, if they have been guilty of any breach of the charterparty, the damages recoverable are only nominal in that the fact that the Egyptian authorities might refuse repair facilities to the ship was not a matter which was foreseen or foreseeable by the parties.

The first matter which I have to consider is: What are the material facts found by the umpire? Paragraph 3 of the award commences: "The sequence of events I find to be as follows: . . ." I, accordingly, take the statements in this paragraph to be the findings of fact, namely, that the vessel, loaded with war stores, was boarded at Port Said on Jan. 14, 1952, by the Egyptian authorities who "made an entry in Arabic in the logbook that the vessel was blacklisted according to Egyptian law". I take para. 5 to be a finding of fact that, after the breakdown, the Egyptian authorities refused to allow any repairs to be done owing to the fact that, as the vessel had carried military stores for the British forces in Egypt, she had been "blacklisted". The vessel was, in fact, delayed about thirty days, and I assume from para. 6 of the award that it was agreed that, but for what I will call the action of the Egyptian authorities, the vessel would have been delayed as a result of the breakdown of her machinery for only four days instead of thirty days. It is also clear from this paragraph that the sum of £2,131 12s. 11d. was agreed by the parties as a figure, after taking all proper matters into account, representing the hire to which the shipowners were entitled if the vessel was not, as the charterers alleged, off hire during the difference between four and thirty days, namely, twenty-six days. Under cl. 10 of the charterparty it is only loss of time caused, inter alia, by breakdown of machinery, which enables the charterers after

A twenty-four hours to put the vessel off hire. There is no doubt that the Dodecanese, having become physically immobilised by the breakdown, remained so physically immobilised for thirty days, and cl. 10 provides that hire shall cease from the moment of the loss of time until the vessel again is in an efficient state to resume service. This did not occur until the end of the thirty days. The umpire has found this very clearly in his award. He has not dealt with the

B shipowners' first claim, which was for loss of hire withheld during the whole period by the charterers, but, finding that the latter were in breach of the charterparty for a reason which no one now seeks to support, he has awarded the shipowners damages based on the rate of the charter hire for the period by which the delay to the vessel was prolonged by the action of the Egyptian authorities in refusing repair facilities.

C It is, I think, quite clear from the passages in the award to which I have referred that the umpire found as a fact that some twenty-six days of the delay which the vessel incurred was due to what I will continue for the moment to call the action of the Egyptian authorities in refusing repair facilities. He found as a fact that this action was taken by them because the vessel had been "blacklisted" by the Egyptian authorities because she had carried military

D stores for the British forces in Egypt. What he does not find as a fact is that there was any Egyptian law entitling the Egyptian authorities to blacklist the vessel, nor what "blacklisting" entailed, nor whether the Egyptian authorities had any right under Egyptian law to refuse repair facilities to a vessel which they had blacklisted. He does find that the charterers' agents, and the charterers, had notice of the contents of letter, No. 9443, before the

E vessel entered on the charter and "were aware of the embargo" before any cargo was loaded on the vessel, whereas there was no evidence that the charterers brought that letter to the notice of the master of the vessel until Jan. 14, 1952, which was the day the vessel entered the canal and the day she was "black-listed". I think it would be right that I should assume that wherever in his award the umpire refers to "the Egyptian authorities" he means the officials

F of the Egyptian government charged with the administration of Egyptian law.

In these circumstances the shipowners contend that the charterers, who were, under the charterparty, the masters of the vessel's trading activities, deliberately sent the vessel loaded with war stores destined for the British forces in Egypt into the Suez Canal and caused her to discharge this cargo at Adabiya, which was a port in Egypt where the loading and discharge of such cargo was, to their knowledge, prohibited by the terms of the letter referred to. In so doing, the shipowners contend, the charterers were in breach of the terms of the charterparty inserted for the protection of the owners: "Steamer to be employed in lawful trades for the conveyance of lawful merchandise". They also point to cl. 12 of the charterparty, which provides that charterers shall

H "be responsible for loss or damage caused to . . . owners by goods being loaded contrary to the terms of this charter . . ."

Counsel for the shipowners contended that ordnance stores and munitions carried by the vessel were not "merchandise" at all, because they were British government property and were not "commodities of commerce", that is to say, goods ordinarily dealt in by merchants. In a charterparty of this kind in which the carriage of explosives and dangerous cargoes is specifically permitted subject to Board of Trade rules and regulations, I think that this submission is too wide. Whether in the particular circumstances of the case the cargo carried was "lawful merchandise" is another matter. Before they entered on the charterparty the charterers had received letter No. 9443 and must be taken to have known that the Egyptian authorities had prohibited vessels from discharging or loading cargoes belonging to the British army at Adabiya. In spite of this, they caused or permitted the vessel to berth for the purpose of discharging and to discharge her cargo of ammunition, etc., at Adabiya, and while there is no specific finding by the umpire that this cargo belonged to "the British forces in Egypt", I think that it would be proper for me to infer this fact from this and other facts found in the award rather than to remit the award to the umpire for a specific finding on this point alone.

There is very little authority on the point as to what, in any given circumstances, constitutes "lawful merchandise". In SCRUTTON ON CHARTERPARTIES, 15th ed., at p. 156, there is this very short passage: "Lawful Merchandise—goods ordinarily shipped from the port of shipment." Then there is a reference to Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1) to which I have already referred. I am told that that short passage is of some standing in the book, and that it was already there when the learned author himself was responsible for what was contained in the book. In CARVER'S CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA, 9th ed., p. 454, under the heading "Goods that may be loaded", there is this passage:

" 'Merchandise ' and 'produce '.—General expressions, such as 'merchandise ', or 'produce ', used to describe the intended cargo, denote things which have those characters in the particular trade, having regard especially to the particular port of loading. 'Produce ' has been said to mean 'anything produced by the country in the neighbourhood of the port of loading, and being an ordinary subject of importation '. Government stores (ordnance, ammunition, etc.) have been held to be not covered by 'lawful merchandise '"; and once again there is a reference to Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1). If I may say so, it seems doubtful whether that case is an authority for the proposition for which it is cited by the learned editor.

It is clear that, if any real meaning is to be given to the words "lawful merchandise", which are, of course, inserted into the charterparty for the protection of the owners, the goods loaded must be such as can be loaded without breach of the law in force at the port of loading. Inasmuch as the master is under the general orders of the charterer as to where a cargo shall be carried within the charter limits, it is at least logical to suppose that the charterer undertakes that the cargo shall also be the type of cargo which can be lawfully carried and discharged at the port to which he has ordered the vessel to proceed. The purpose of the provision that only "lawful merchandise" shall be carried by the charterers would be largely nullified if all that was necessary was that the cargo could be loaded without breaking the laws of the country where it was loaded. I was referred to Capper v. Forster (4), and also to Potter & Co. v. New Zealand Shipping Co., Ltd. (5). Neither of these cases, however, assists me in the determination of what is meant by the words "lawful merchandise".

Egypt is a sovereign State, and the principal difficulty which I have found is whether I am able to spell out from the facts found by the umpire a finding of fact that the Egyptian law was as stated in letter No. 9443. The umpire finds as a fact that the Egyptian authorities issued this letter, and that the charterers had knowledge of its contents before the cargo was loaded. The letter, no doubt, constitutes some evidence of what the Egyptian law was at the material time. Egyptian law, for the umpire, was a question of fact. I have little doubt that the umpire was satisfied, on the evidence of letter No. 9443, that the Egyptian law was as stated in the letter, and he, accordingly, stated the purport of the letter in para. 8 of his award, to which the preface is: "Upon these contentions I find the following further facts . . ." I, therefore, infer that the umpire has found that the letter in question stated accurately the effect of Egyptian law. If this be so, the cargo was one which the charterers knew, or ought to have known, before they loaded it, could not be discharged at Adabiya without breaking Egyptian law. The cargo was discharged at Adabiya, and it was not until after this was done that the Egyptian authorities

- A took any active step against the vessel by refusing her repair facilities. The cargo was destined for Adabiya, and, in causing it to be discharged there, the charterers disregarded the prohibition in letter No. 9443 which, in my opinion, the umpire has found to be an accurate statement of Egyptian law. If the cargo could not lawfully be discharged at the port where the charterers ordered it to be discharged, it was not, in my opinion, lawful merchandise. The umpire
- B has found as a fact—and I quote from para. 5 of the award:

"The Egyptian authorities refused to allow any repairs to be done owing to the fact that as the vessel had carried military stores for the British forces in Egypt she had been blacklisted . . ."

- C He has found the total period of delay, and it was agreed by the parties that the repairs to the engine breakdown would only have taken four days but for the interference of the Egyptian authorities.

In my view, for the reasons which I have set out, the umpire was right in finding that the charterers committed a breach of the charterparty in that they failed in all the circumstances to load the vessel with "lawful merchandise", but wrong in so far as he arrived at that conclusion on the authority

- D of Vanderspar & Co. v. Duncan & Co. (1).

[HIS LORDSHIP found that the umpire was entitled to assess the damages, as he did, on the basis of the hire claimed by the shipowners for the period of twenty-six days by which, it was agreed, the period of delay had been prolonged by the refusal of the Egyptian authorities in refusing repair facilities, and affirmed the award.]

R. v. ROBINSON.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Hallett, Streatfeild and Donovan, JJ.), June 8, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Appeal—Appeal on question of law and also on further grounds involving questions of fact or mixed law and fact—Need for leave to argue further grounds—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (c. 23), s. 3 (a), (b).

By s. 3 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, a person convicted on indictment may appeal against conviction (a) without leave on any ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone, and (b) with leave on a question of fact alone or of mixed law and fact.

Per curiam: If an offender has appealed without leave on a ground involving a question of law alone, he is not thereby entitled to argue further grounds which involve questions of fact alone or of mixed law and fact without obtaining leave from the court to appeal on those further grounds.

The practice followed by the registrar (under the direction of the court) where a notice of appeal contains a mixture of questions of law and questions of fact alone or of mixed law and fact has been to put the case in the list as an application for leave to appeal.

FOR THE CRIMINAL APPEAL ACT, 1907, s. 3, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 928.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Frederick Robinson, was convicted before LORD GODDARD, C.J., at the Central Criminal Court on charges of robbery with violence and robbery with aggravation and was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment.

E. Clarke for the appellant.

Durand for the Crown.

HALLETT, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. There was lodged on behalf of the appellant a notice of appeal which was in very general terms and was supplemented by particulars of the grounds of appeal. Those particulars are given under three heads. In the first place, it is complained:

"That the Lord Chief Justice misdirected the jury in law by telling them that evidence against the appellant on the first count of robbery was also evidence of his guilt on the second count of robbery."

The second head is:

"That the Lord Chief Justice misdirected the jury on fact . . ."

in nine particulars which are specified, and the third head is that:

"Generally the Lord Chief Justice omitted to put the defence adequately to the jury, and, in the circumstances of a difficult case, the summing-up was improperly unfavourable to the appellant, thereby resulting in a miscarriage of justice."

There arises in connection with this matter a question of procedure with which it is desirable that the court should deal.

First, there would be neither this court nor the right of appeal to it, but for the provisions of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. Accordingly, if a question arises as to a right of appeal, it is the statute that one must examine to discover what right is conferred, and subject to what conditions, if any, and to what limitations, if any, and it is necessary for this purpose to look only at s. 3 by which:

"A person convicted on indictment may appeal under this Act to the Court of Criminal Appeal—(a) against his conviction on any ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone; and (b) with the leave of the Court of Criminal Appeal or upon the certificate of the judge who tried him that it is a fit case for appeal against his conviction on any ground of appeal which involves a question of fact alone, or a question of mixed law and fact, or any other ground which appears to the court to be a sufficient ground of appeal . . .”

The words of sub-s. (a), in our opinion, must be carefully observed. An offender is not given a right of appeal, as counsel for the appellant appears to be contending, to the Court of Criminal Appeal if he has a ground of appeal which involves a question of fact, though he may appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal without leave on any ground which involves a question of law alone. It appears that the correct application of sub-s. (a) depends on the adoption of one of three views. The first view which might be taken is that the appellant only gets a right of appeal without leave if he elects to confine himself to a point of law. The second view is that by sub-s. (a) he is granted a right of appeal without leave in so far as his ground of appeal is a ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone. The third view, which is the view for which counsel for the appellant, as we understand it, contends, is that, if he has a ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone, he can appeal without leave both on that question and on questions of fact or mixed law and fact.

The first view, which is the strict view, is that which has been adopted in arriving at the practice, which has been followed under the direction of the court, that where a notice of appeal contains grounds based on law and also grounds based on fact, the case should be put in the list as an application for leave to appeal. If the strict view were taken, that an appellant has only a right to appeal without leave if he confines himself to a point of law, that would be the right procedure. On the present occasion, however, it was thought that, as the appellant had a ground of appeal which involved a question of law alone, it would not be right to say to him: “You cannot raise a further point without leave under sub-s. (b) because you have chosen in your notice of appeal to associate it with other points which clearly fall within the scope of sub-s. (b).” For that reason, directions were given that, so far as the point of law was concerned, the matter should be put in the list as an appeal to be heard without leave. On the other hand, if the third view were taken, it seems to us that it would result in sub-s. (b) being rendered inoperative in very many cases.

We think that where an appellant is entitled under s. 3 (a) to appeal to this court on a ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone, that does not entitle him also to appeal on a ground which involves a question of fact alone or a question of mixed law and fact. We recognise that the course which has been followed on the present occasion has very grave practical inconveniences, since it would be more convenient if we could deal with all the grounds raised at one and the same time. On the other hand, it would be, as it seems to us, against the spirit of what Parliament has provided by sub-s. (b), if we were to allow questions of fact or of mixed fact and law to be put forward without leave merely because one of the grounds in the notice of appeal was a ground which involved a question of law alone.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the substance of the appeal.]

Appeal dismissed.

SLADE AND ANOTHER v. METRODENT, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), May 11, 1953.]

Master and Servant—Apprenticeship—Benefit of infant—Arbitration clause—Action by infant—Stay of proceedings—Arbitration Act, 1950 (c. 27), s. 4.

By an indenture dated Aug. 31, 1949, the plaintiff, an infant, bound himself as apprentice to the defendants for five years to learn the craft of dental mechanics. Contained in the indenture was a clause whereby it was agreed that any questions or differences arising between the parties should be referred to arbitration by the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians. On Feb. 2, 1953, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming damages from the defendants for breach of their obligations under the indenture, alleging that they had failed or neglected to teach or instruct him in the craft and had repudiated their obligations. On an application by the defendants to stay the proceedings under the Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 4,

HELD: an infant, even during infancy, was bound by any contract which the court considered was for his benefit as a whole; an apprenticeship deed containing an arbitration clause might be beneficial to an infant; in any event, the present deed as a whole was for the benefit of the infant, and, even assuming that the arbitration clause was not for his benefit, it was not open to him to treat the arbitration clause as an independent agreement; and, consequently, the proceedings under the writ must be stayed.

APPEAL by defendants to judge in chambers adjourned into court for judgment.

J. G. K. Sheldon for the defendants.

McKinnon for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. McNAIR, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the defendants against the decision of Master BURNAND given on Mar. 5, 1953, by which he refused to stay further proceedings in the action pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1950. In the action, which was commenced by writ dated Feb. 2, 1953, the first plaintiff, who is an infant suing by his father and next friend, and the second plaintiff, the father and next friend, sue the defendants under the terms of an apprenticeship deed dated Aug. 31, 1949, by which the infant plaintiff bound himself apprentice to the defendants to learn the craft of dental mechanics for a period of five years. The second plaintiff as the guardian joined in, and assumed obligations under, the deed.

In summary, the claim in the action is that the defendants failed and neglected properly or at all to teach or instruct the infant plaintiff or to cause him to be taught or instructed as aforesaid and have repudiated the indenture and their obligations thereunder. Before taking any step in the action the defendants applied to the master to stay the proceedings under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, relying on cl. 6 of the indenture which is in the following terms:

A “The parties to this indenture hereby jointly and severally agree that all questions or differences whatsoever which may at any time hereafter arise between the parties hereto or their respective representatives touching these presents or the subject-matter thereof or arising out of or in relation thereto respectively and whether as to construction or otherwise shall be referred to the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians and each of the parties shall do all acts and things and execute all deeds and instruments necessary to give effect to the award to be made pursuant to this submission.”

B It being conceded or, if not conceded, established to my satisfaction, that this clause would (subject to the question of infancy) constitute a valid arbitration agreement within the meaning of s. 4, the onus lies on the plaintiffs to satisfy me that effect should not be given to it.

C Counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs argued (i) that as a matter of principle an agreement by an infant to submit to arbitration is voidable at the infant's election, and (ii) that, assuming that the arbitration agreement is binding on the infant, the court as a matter of discretion ought not to stay the action. In support of the first submission counsel relied on a passage in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT to the effect that

D “if an infant submits to arbitration, he may execute or avoid at his election as he may do all other his contracts”, and a passage in COMYNS' DIGEST, as follows:

E “But an infant cannot submit to arbitrament; for his submission is void. Yet if an infant and a man of full age join in a submission, it is good; for though the infant cannot be obliged to stand by it, yet his submission is only voidable and he may agree or disagree to the award at his full age.”

Certain modern text-books take the same view. For example, in CHITTY ON CONTRACTS, 20th ed., p. 598, it is stated that:

F “He [the infant] is not bound by an agreement to refer a dispute to arbitration.”

Again, in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 1, p. 625, para. 1073, one finds the following view expressed:

G “With regard to infants, it would seem that a submission made by an infant could not be enforced against him during his infancy, and would be voidable by him on attaining his majority . . .”

On the other hand, in RUSSELL ON ARBITRATION, 14th ed., p. 18, after reference has been made to the passages in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT and COMYNS' DIGEST above quoted, the proposition is stated thus:

H “The result, therefore, seems to be that a submission to arbitration by an infant is voidable by him and cannot effectively be ratified, except when it relates to the supply of necessities, a reasonable contract of service, or a contract plainly for the infant's benefit, and then it is binding upon him even during infancy, and quite apart from any question of ratification.”

In my judgment, the question before me falls to be determined on two well-established principles—(i) that an infant, even during infancy, is bound by any contract which the court considers, after examining all its terms, is for the benefit of the infant, and (ii) that, if the contract as a whole is beneficial, the infant cannot pick and choose and adopt those terms which are clearly beneficial while rejecting those terms which are not beneficial or not clearly beneficial: see Clements v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (1). The judgment of KAY, L.J. ([1894] 2 Q.B. 490) in that case sets out a quotation from COKE UPON LITTLETON, 172a, to the effect that there are some exceptions to the infant's inability to bind himself by contract as "an infant may bind himself to pay for his necessary meat, drink, apparel, necessary physicke, and such other necessities, and likewise for his good teaching or instruction, whereby he may profit himself afterwards."

The question for the court in any particular case of an apprenticeship deed is whether the agreement as a whole is for the benefit of the infant. In Wood v. Fenwick (2), the interlocutory observations of ALDERSON, B., and LORD ABINGER, C.B. (10 M. & W. 204), clearly indicate that an apprenticeship deed containing an arbitration clause might in their view be beneficial to an infant. Having examined the apprenticeship deed here in question, I am clearly of the opinion that the deed as a whole is beneficial as it provides for the instruction of the infant in the art of dental mechanics by an active practitioner at a wage and under conditions approved by certain professional and trade bodies of high standing. The deed itself requires registration with the National Joint Council for the Craft of Dental Technicians, a body on which, as I am informed, both employees and craftsmen are represented, and it is improbable that such a body would accept for registration any deed which was not beneficial to the apprentice. Even assuming, but not accepting, that the clause providing for the reference of disputes arising thereunder to the arbitrament of the joint council would, standing by itself, be considered not beneficial to the infant, he would, in my judgment, nevertheless be bound by it if the agreement as a whole was for his benefit, as I have found.

An attempt was made to meet this conclusion by the submission that the arbitration clause is to be treated as an independent agreement separate from the deed itself. The argument in support was based on decisions which have established that an arbitration clause may be effective even though the main contractual obligations have been discharged by breach or by frustration or by illegality. In my judgment, this argument is unsound and is not supported by the decision in Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd. (3): see, in particular, the speech of LORD MACMILLAN [1942] 1 All E.R. 347. Furthermore, in the present case, seeing that the infant is adopting the apprenticeship deed by suing on it, it is not open to him to reject the arbitration clause which forms part of it. As regards the question of discretion, I feel no hesitation at all in holding that, in my judgment, the arbitration clause should be given effect to. The nature of the dispute as shown by the statement of claim is essentially one fit to be adjudicated on, at any rate so far as concerns matters of fact and the practice of the art of dental mechanics, by a body such as the joint council. Adjudication before such a body would avoid the necessity of calling any expert evidence. Furthermore, the clause in no way involves an ouster of the jurisdiction of the court or in any way interferes with the jealous regard which the court observes for the interests of infants. In my judgment, the action should be stayed under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1950, and the appeal allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

MILLAR v. BUILDING CONTRACTORS (LUTON), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), May 15, 18, 1953.]

A Practice—Payment out of court—Application to take out money in court after final speeches, but before judgment—Indication by judge that he did not believe applicant's evidence—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 3.

B In an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts, the plaintiff made an application, after the final speeches had been made but before judgment had been given, to take out a sum of money which had been paid into court by the defendants. During the evidence the learned judge had indicated that he was minded to reject the plaintiff's evidence, and counsel for the plaintiff admitted that this indication had prompted the plaintiff's application.

HELD: in the exercise of its discretion under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 3, the court would refuse the application.

APPLICATION by the plaintiff in an action to take out money in court.

Stabb and Grieve for the plaintiff.

A. M. Lee for the defendants.

E SLADE, J.: My jurisdiction is contained in R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 3. It is clear that I have jurisdiction to accede to the application of counsel for the plaintiff, and it is equally clear from the wording of the rule and from the judgment of GODDARD, L.J., in Cumper v. Potheary (1) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 520-523), that I have a complete discretion to grant or to refuse the application. That discretion must, of course, be exercised judicially. How ought I to exercise it in this case? I have no doubt whatever that I should refuse the application.

F It is obvious that the plaintiff thinks that, if I were to accede to the application, she is likely to recover more by accepting the amount in court than she is likely to recover as a result of my judgment. It is not only a question of costs; it is also one of the amount to be recovered, and I think it would be unfair to the defendants to allow the plaintiff to adopt an attitude which really, in colloquial parlance, amounts to: "Heads I win; tails I do not lose".

G If I were to accede to an application of this kind, it might encourage a plaintiff not to take the money out of court under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 2, not to make an application for leave to take it out at the commencement of the trial, or even in the course of the evidence, but to wait until the closing speeches, and then, if the judge should indicate that he was not impressed by the plaintiff's evidence, to say, at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute: "Now is the time to make my application." I have no doubt whatever that in the exercise of my judicial discretion I ought to refuse this application.

R. v. ROBERTS.

[CARDIFF ASSIZES (Devlin, J.), March 23, 24, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Plea—Deaf mute—Right of defence to require general issue to be tried before issue of fitness to plead.

A defendant, who was indicted for murder, stood mute on being arraigned and was found by a jury to be mute by the visitation of God, having been deaf and dumb from birth. The Crown submitted that the issue whether or not he was fit to plead should be tried before the general issue, while the defence submitted that the general issue should be tried first.

HELD: if counsel for the defence thought that he could properly obtain for the defendant a verdict of Not Guilty, he was entitled to require that the general issue should be tried, and there could also be left to the jury the question whether the defendant was fit to plead.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—Statements alleged to have been made by deaf mute.

The evidence for the prosecution, on an indictment for a murder, included certain statements alleged to have been made by the defendant, a deaf mute. The defence objected to this evidence on the ground that the defendant could not have made, and did not make, the statements. On the question whether the objection was to be tried by the judge or was a matter for the jury,

HELD: the judge would determine whether there was some evidence fit to go to the jury that the statements were those of the defendant, and, if he thought that there was, he would admit the statements, and let them go to the jury; if he did not think that there was, he would rule them out.

TRIAL on an indictment for murder.

The defendant, on being arraigned, stood mute, and a jury was impanelled to try the issue whether he was mute by malice or by the visitation of God. Evidence, which was not contradicted, was called by the defence to show that he had been deaf and dumb from birth, and the jury found that he was mute by the visitation of God. Counsel for the Crown submitted that the evidence so far called raised a presumption of idiotism; that, prima facie, the accused was unfit to plead, and incapable of following the proceedings, of instructing counsel for the defence, or of challenging a juror; and that on the authorities these matters

(on which the Crown had further evidence to call) should be next tried. It was common ground that, if the accused were found unfit to plead, the learned judge must order his detention as a Broadmoor patient till Her Majesty's pleasure should be known. Counsel for the defence submitted that no presumption of idiotism arose, and that there was no precedent for trying the issue whether or not the defendant was fit to plead before the general issue on the application of the Crown, although such a course had been taken on an application by the defence. In reply to DEVLIN, J., he intimated that there was a defence on the facts, and that he desired that the jury should try the defendant on the general issue.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and J. J. Roberts for the Crown.

H. Edmund Davies, Q.C., S. J. H. Evans and Hywel ap Robert for the defendant.

DEVLIN, J.: In this case the defendant has been found to be mute by the visitation of God on the verdict of a jury, and principle and authority direct that, unless there is some reason for taking some other course, that finding should be the basis of entering a plea of Not Guilty on behalf of the defendant and the trial against him must proceed. But whether the defendant is found mute of malice or mute by the visitation of God, a question often arises at the beginning of a trial whether he is fit to plead, and it has been laid down clearly by the authorities that, if it be established that a man's mind is such that he would be incapable of understanding the nature of the proceedings, it would not be right that he should be put on his trial and convicted of the offence. Such a conviction could not stand. It is clear from the authorities that it is not merely defects of the mind which may bring about that result. Defects of the senses, whether or not combined with some defect of the mind, may do so, and the authorities are clear that, if there are no certain means of communication with the defendant so that there are no certain means of making sure that he will follow as much as it is necessary that he should follow of the proceedings at his trial, he should then be found unfit to plead.

In this case, the defendant being mute by the visitation of God, counsel on both sides are agreed, broadly speaking, that there are no certain means of communicating with him the procedure which takes place at this trial, and the question which has arisen is whether that is a matter which has to be determined by the jury in this case, as it is in most cases, at once, the jury being specially sworn for that purpose, or whether, in effect, it can be tried and determined by the jury together with the trial and determination of the general issue whether the defendant be Guilty or Not Guilty. Counsel for the defence wishes the general issue to be tried. He has not disclosed, as, of course, he is not bound to disclose, and, indeed, should not have disclosed, what the nature of his defence is. It may well be that the defence is that the prosecution witnesses do not make out a prima facie case, or it may be that the defence has other witnesses, not yet called, who, if believed, would destroy the case which the prosecution would otherwise have made out. Whatever it may be, it is a perfectly conceivable situation, though it never appears to have arisen in practice before, that counsel for the defence, although he cannot be instructed by the defendant, may say: "I do not think the prosecution can make any case against the defendant. If it can, then, of course, I am in no position to defend it with his aid because he cannot instruct me and cannot tell his story. But, as the prosecution can make out no case, I am not prepared to let the matter go merely on the issue whether he is fit or unfit to plead". If that issue is tried, and is tried alone, and a verdict is returned by the jury that the defendant is unfit to plead, the court has no power except to make one order, viz., that he should be detained as a criminal lunatic, or Broadmoor patient as it is now called, until Her Majesty's pleasure be made known, which means, of course, for an indefinite period.

Counsel for the defence cannot be forced to accept that course for his client if, on a true view of the facts, he thinks that he can obtain for his client properly a verdict of Not Guilty. Nor can he be forced to elect. He must be entitled to retain his right to say that the defendant is not in a position to give him instructions and, therefore, he cannot put the defendant in the witness box to tell his own story. He cannot be forced to say to himself: "Shall I play for safety and obtain a verdict whereby the defendant is detained as a criminal lunatic, or shall I, in effect, gamble on the chance of my being able to get him off altogether, with the knowledge that if my gamble fails he will be convicted of murder and there is only one sentence which the court can pass". Though, therefore, it does not appear to be a position which has ever arisen before, and counsel have told me that they have found no authority on the matter, it seems to me that there must be a procedure which would enable counsel for the defence to have the advantage of taking both points. There cannot be any doctrine in a criminal case which compels counsel to elect, and, if there was no such procedure, I think that it would be necessary to invent one, because to insist on the issue being tried of fitness to plead or not might result in the grave injustice of detaining as a criminal lunatic a man who was innocent, and, indeed, it might result in the public mischief that a person so detained would be assumed, in the eyes of the police and of the authorities, to have been the person responsible for the crime—whether he was or was not—and investigations which might have led to the apprehension of the true criminal would not take place.

So far from there being any authority which would compel me to require that procedure to be adopted—and it is only if there was clear authority to compel me to do it that I should be inclined to take that course—I think the authorities indicate that there is a procedure which can properly be followed in a case of this type. The earlier authorities all deal with the principles on which a jury should be charged. I have not investigated them, but counsel for the defence told me, without contradiction, I think, that in each of the earlier authorities the points had been taken by the defence, and, of course, it may very well be, and most frequently will be, that the defence were in the position of having no answer to a prima facie case and no ground to urge why the law should not take its course, except the ground that the defendant would be incapable of understanding the proceedings at the trial and incapable, therefore, of putting up any defence. But in R. v. Berry (1), which came before the Court for Crown Cases Reserved in 1876, a different course was followed. Whether it was followed designedly or not, or whether it was followed because it was thought desirable that there should be some inquiry into the general issue, I do not know. But it is plain from the case that, although a question arose whether or not the prisoner was fit to plead, that question was not submitted to the jury until the prosecution had proved their case, when it was submitted to them, they being asked for a special verdict in conjunction with the general issue. That case was also one where the jury had been sworn to ascertain whether the prisoner stood mute of malice or by the visitation of God, and they found that the prisoner was mute by the visitation of God. The trial proceeded because it was thought that a brother-in-law of the prisoner might be able to communicate with him by means of signs. The learned chairman of the quarter sessions then put two questions to the jury: (i) whether they found the prisoner Guilty or Not Guilty on the indictment, and (ii) whether, in their opinion, the prisoner was capable of understanding, and had understood, the nature of the proceedings. The verdict of the jury was:

"We find the prisoner Guilty on the evidence; and we also find that he is not capable of understanding, and, as a fact, has not understood the nature of the proceedings."

A Case was stated, and the Court for Crown Cases Reserved found on that evidence that the prisoner could not be convicted, although the jury had found him Guilty, since they had also found that he was not capable of understanding and had not understood the nature of the proceedings. On that verdict the court held that the proper course was that he should be detained under the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1800, s. 2, as the finding of the jury amounted in point of law to a finding of insanity.

I think that R. v. Berry (1) is the first reported case in which the two issues, the general issue and the issue of fitness to plead, were put before a jury together, and it is significant that there is nothing to be found in the judgments in Berry's case (1) which expresses or implies the slightest criticism of that procedure. In the course of the argument KELLY, C.B., said (1 Q.B.D. 449):

"But here the jury have found also that the prisoner was incapable of understanding what passed at the trial, and can it be contended that he might, under such circumstances, be convicted? The question which ought to have been put to the jury in R. v. Steel (2) was properly put in the present one."

Although KELLY, C.B., was not dealing in terms with the time when the question was put, it would be a curious observation to make if his view was that, although the question was properly put, the procedure by which it had been put was entirely wrong and the issue ought to have been tried earlier and separately. The court treated the verdict of the jury so returned as a faulty verdict because, on the question being raised whether there was any authority for detaining the accused as an insane person, KELLY, C.B., relied on the finding of the jury as justifying that course, since, he said (ibid., 451), it amounted in point of law to a finding of insanity.

R. v. Berry (1) and all the earlier cases of any importance were considered by a Divisional Court in R. v. Stafford Prison (Governor). Ex p. Emery (3). In that case an accused person, who had been found by a jury to be unfit to plead, was detained under the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1800, s. 2, and the validity of his detention was challenged by a writ of habeas corpus, the question which the court had to determine being whether deafness and inability to read and write and, therefore, to be communicated with, was equivalent, for the purposes of the wording of the Act, to a finding of insanity, and they held that it was. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., reviewed the earlier authorities, viz., R. v. Steel (2), R. v. Pritchard (4) before ALDERSON, B., and R. v. Dyson (5) before PARKE, J., in all of which cases the issue had been put to the jury without the general issue being gone into. He then referred to R. v. Berry (1), and recited the facts of that case, again without any criticism of the procedure which had been followed. At the end of his judgment he followed the earlier decisions in these terms ([1909] 2 K.B. 87):

"That [R. v. Berry (1)] is a decision which approved of and adopted the view of the law taken by PARKE, J., and ALDERSON, B., years before; and, following and adopting those decisions, I think that CHANNELL, J., in the present case laid down the right test of insanity for the purpose of the Act of 1800 and rightly made an order for the prisoner's detention during His Majesty's pleasure."

That shows that LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., took the view that all these authorities were laying down one doctrine, the difference between them, viz., the time when the verdict was taken, being only, I think, a difference of procedure.

In cases where the defence is not going to challenge that the prosecution has a prima facie case, and has no evidence which might induce a jury to reject the evidence for the prosecution, then the convenient course is to let the issue be tried at once. I can find no authority in the cases cited which would prevent counsel for the defence, who wishes to test the prosecution's case on the general issue, from having the right to do so, at the same time preserving all those rights which flow to the defence from the fact that the defendant is a person, if it be so established, who is incapable of being communicated with or from instructing counsel for his defence. Were it otherwise, I think that the gravest mischief and injustice might follow. The defence might wish to tender a witness who, if he was believed, could prove that the defendant was ten miles away at the time of the alleged crime. It cannot, I think, be our law that, by some formality of procedure, counsel for the defendant should be prevented from laying matters of that sort before the jury, and so achieving for his client, if he can, a verdict of Not Guilty.

In the course of giving this ruling, I have not concerned myself with the question whether it is right for the prosecution to begin such matters, i.e., whether the burden is on the prosecution or on the defence to establish unfitness to plead. That is a mere matter of presumption one way or the other. The issue here is the fundamental one, not whether it is right or wrong for one side to take the point first—whether the prosecution should take it or whether the defence should take it—but, in effect, whether the position of the defence can be so put that learned counsel has to choose between fighting the general issue or dealing with the issue of unfitness to plead. On that fundamental question, I think that the submission made to me by counsel for the defence is the right one. The consequence of that, therefore, is that I shall not now swear the jury to try separately the question whether or not the defendant is fit to plead. They will be sworn merely to try the general issue.

[Counsel were asked by HIS LORDSHIP whether, in the circumstances, any difference of opinion existed between them as to what matters should be put to the jury on that, and what form of verdict they should be asked to return. They both intimated that there was no objection to the form of questions to the jury, or to the form of verdict, in Berry's case (1). HIS LORDSHIP continued:] I do not see why I should not leave the questions to the jury in the form in which they were left in Berry's case (1), but, if the jury return a verdict of Guilty, I shall take the course which the Court for Crown Cases Reserved took and make the order which that court said was the proper order to be made.

The indictment was then read, and a plea of Not Guilty entered by direction of the learned judge. Leading counsel for the defence did not desire any part of the proceedings to be interpreted to the defendant and DEVLIN, J., so directed, observing that, if there were no certain means of communicating with the defendant, there was no possible advantage in embarking on a doubtful means. The trial then proceeded. The Crown conceded that, unless certain purported statements by the defendant came before the jury, they could not be asked to convict. Evidence of such statements was, therefore, called first, at the suggestion of DEVLIN, J. It was debated whether an objection to this evidence that the defendant could not have made, and did not make, the purported statements was triable by the judge or was a matter for the jury. Objections going to the voluntary character of the purported statements (such objections being always triable by the judge) were also raised.

DEVLIN, J., gave the following ruling. I shall inquire into the two questions whether the statements which are alleged to have been made by the defendant were, in fact, his statements, and, if so, whether they were made voluntarily and in accordance with the Judges' Rules, and I shall reach that conclusion of fact on the latter question in the ordinary way. On the former question, it seems to me, subject to anything which counsel for the defence may say, that it would be right that, if I think there is some evidence fit to go to the jury that they were his statements, I shall admit the statements and let them go to the jury. If I do not think that there is any evidence fit to go to the jury that they are his statements, I shall rule them out.

[The Crown, with the approval of HIS LORDSHIP, offered no further evidence on the indictment. Evidence was heard on the circumstances of the defendant's detention, and the jury, by direction, found the defendant Not Guilty.]

JONES v. JONES.

B [PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Collingwood and Karminski, JJ.), May 4, 1953.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Summons for maintenance on ground of desertion—Defence of reasonable and honest belief by husband in wife's adultery—Standard of proof.

C Per KARMINSKI, J.: The defence to a charge of desertion of reasonable belief in a wife's adultery is one which in most circumstances is not susceptible of easy proof. Nor should it be. It falls into the category of charges which may be easy to make and less easy to disprove. I believe it to be implicit that in cases where the defence is reasonable belief the defence should be fully and completely proved, and that, unless it is so proved, it should be rejected.

D The husband complained to the wife about her association with a police sergeant and at about 1.30 a.m. on Aug. 1, 1952, he saw her come out of a garage and run home by a circuitous route. Shortly afterwards he saw the sergeant also walk away from the garage. The husband spoke to the sergeant, but did not ask him if he had been speaking to his wife. Later that day the husband went to see a police inspector, the sergeant's superior officer, and made a statement to him. The husband thereupon left the matrimonial home on the ground that the wife had so conducted herself as to induce in him a reasonable belief in her adultery. On a summons by the wife alleging that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance,

F HELD: there was no evidence on which a court could find that the husband had proved that he had a bona fide and reasonable belief in his wife's adultery; the statement to the police inspector was inadmissible and could not constitute corroboration of the husband's allegation; and the wife was entitled to an order for maintenance.

APPEAL by the wife against the dismissal by the justices for the petty sessional division of Bangor on Sept. 18, 1952, of her complaint that her husband had wilfully neglected to provide her with reasonable maintenance.

The parties were married on Aug. 26, 1939, and there were three children of the marriage. At the hearing before the justices the husband stated that he had, after the war, spent some twelve months abroad in the services and that on his return he had cause to complain of his wife's association with a police sergeant; that on one occasion he, the husband, had noticed the sergeant ring his bicycle bell as he passed in the street which led him to believe that the sergeant was trying to attract the attention of his wife; that he had seen his wife speaking to the sergeant in the street; that he had heard something from neighbours; and that on Aug. 1, 1952, about 1.00 a.m. he was awakened by a child crying and found his wife not in her room, that he went out, saw the houses of two neighbours in darkness and waited on the corner of a street near a garage, that he saw their dog run in front of the garage, that he saw his wife come from the garage door and run by a circuitous route home, and that shortly afterwards he saw the police sergeant walk away, that he spoke to the police sergeant but did not tax him with having been speaking to his wife, and that on his return home his wife was lying fully clothed on her bed, looking terrified, and that she had explained that she had taken a circuitous route home because someone had thrown something at her and frightened her. The wife in evidence stated that, on the night in question, she had taken the dog out and visited the house of one of the neighbours where she had listened to a wireless programme for over an hour, that she then discovered that the dog had escaped, that she went to look for it and found it near the garage. The neighbour was called, but the justices found that her evidence did not assist one way or the other. It was common ground that there was a quarrel when the husband returned home in the early hours of Aug. 1 and that later that day he left home. On that same day the husband also made a statement to a police inspector, the sergeant's superior officer.

On those facts the justices found that the husband had a bona fide belief, induced by the wife, that she had committed adultery, and dismissed her summons. The wife now appealed.

Mars-Jones for the wife.

B. G. Irvine for the husband.

COLLINGWOOD, J., stated the facts and continued: It is well established by Glenister v. Glenister (1), and a number of subsequent cases in which that decision has been approved, that if a wife has so conducted herself as to lead any reasonable person to believe, until she gives some explanation, that she has committed adultery, a husband becoming aware of the facts and honestly drawing that inference and leaving his wife, ought not to be held to have left her without reasonable cause. Furthermore, with reference to the question of a husband's bona fide and reasonable belief in his wife's adultery, I will refer to a short passage ([1951] 1 All E.R. 731) at the conclusion of the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in Allen v. Allen (2):

" . . . it seems to me that, if a man says: 'I bona fide and reasonably believe that my wife is an adulteress' as a defence in proceedings of this character, the result is neither irrational nor unjust if he be regarded as saying this: 'I say and allege that the evidence and materials in my possession are such that on them a court should and would find that adultery has been committed'."

Now, let me apply that criterion to the evidence before the justices in this case. I have already spoken of the association between the wife and the police sergeant so far as the conduct of the wife was concerned. Assume that she had been speaking to him in the street on one occasion (she can hardly have been held responsible for the ringing of a bicycle bell by the sergeant), and assume that on this occasion she had come at this hour of the morning from the vicinity of the embrasure by the garage door, the justices say that they

"considered that the complaint made by the husband to the police inspector on the first opportunity which he had was a material factor in his favour . . . After seeing and hearing both parties the justices accepted the husband's evidence in general and particularly his version of what he said he saw on the night of July 31, 1952. The justices came to the conclusion on the facts presented that the husband had a bona fide belief, induced by the wife, that she had committed adultery."

- A It is difficult to understand to what the first of those statements refers. These events happened in the early morning of Aug. 1, and the husband did, on Aug. 1, go to the police inspector, the superior officer of the sergeant, and somehow or other a statement was put in, which was a statement made to that officer. Clearly it was not admissible in evidence. That is conceded here today.
- B Equally clearly it was not objected to. But how the justices can have decided that that complaint, made to the police inspector on the first opportunity which the husband had, was a material factor in his favour, I must confess I am quite unable to see. It looks as though they meant that it afforded corroboration of his evidence with regard to the events of the early morning of Aug. 1. Of course, that is not even argued. It cannot possibly afford such corroboration.
- C I can only think that they are confusing the matter with a quite different class of case in which the fact that a complaint is made to a suitable person at the earliest opportunity after an offence has been committed is admissible as showing consistency of conduct on the part of the complainant, but what that has to do with this case I am quite unable to see. Taking the evidence of the husband at its highest, in my opinion, it is quite impossible to say that it comes anywhere near the test laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the passage to which I have referred ([1951] 1 All E.R. 731). Further than that, according to LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Glenister v. Glenister (1) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 518):

- E " . . . the husband, becoming aware of the facts and honestly drawing that inference and leaving his wife on that ground ought not to be held to have left her without reasonable cause."

In his cross-examination in the present case the husband was asked a number of questions bearing on his state of mind, and he said in answer to those questions:

- F "I am contesting the case because I caught her out with Sergeant — at twenty to two in the morning, and, in my opinion, that is an offence. I left home because she ran away and there was a person whom I had continually told her about. I cannot say whether he had committed adultery with her."

- G He does not there suggest that he entertained a suspicion of his wife's adultery. What he is saying is: "I had warned her about not talking to this man before, and I found that she was disobeying me, and disobeying me at this hour in the morning, and I think that is an offence". In my opinion, it is quite impossible to say that the wife had given reasonable grounds for belief in her adultery, even if the husband had gone to the length of saying that he entertained such a belief.

- H In my opinion, the justices here have misdirected themselves as to the requirements to comply with the decision in Glenister v. Glenister (1), and they have misdirected themselves with regard to the statement to the police inspector. I am not losing sight for one moment of the oft-repeated principles laid down by the House of Lords in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (3). I think this case falls clearly within the third of the principles enunciated by LORD THANKERTON in that well-known judgment, and for that reason the finding cannot stand. We have not the material before us on which to decide the amount of maintenance which should be awarded to the wife, and, therefore, it will be necessary for the matter to be remitted to the justices for them to ascertain that amount. We do find, however, wilful neglect to maintain.

KARMINSKI, J.: I agree. This is a case where the justices expressed a preference for the version of the facts given by the husband over that given by the wife, and I agree with my Lord that their conclusions on that finding are unsatisfactory. They found that there was a material factor in favour of the husband, viz., the fact that his complaint about the behaviour of his wife and the police sergeant was made to the police inspector at Bangor on the first available opportunity. The statement made by the husband to the police inspector seems to have been put in in re-examination, no objection was taken to it, and it reached the file of this court. But how that statement can in any way be a material factor in the husband's favour, I am unable to understand. Be that as it may, it appears, on reading the justices' reasons, to have influenced them, and if that is right, and I believe it is, then we are not precluded, as my Lord has pointed out, from questioning, and, indeed, dissenting from, the justices' finding on the facts. But even if the facts as found by the justices were right, I am satisfied that they misdirected themselves seriously as to the requirements of the law in cases of this kind. In their reasons they say

"The leading case of Glenister v. Glenister (1) was cited by the husband's solicitor in his closing address . . . The justices retired and traversed the evidence. They called in their clerk and asked for his guidance regarding the authority quoted. He read out the headnote and the judgments, and also read out the case of Chilton v. Chilton (4), which he advised was relevant to the present case."

I do not know from that what advice the clerk gave, or whether such advice was accepted or not. The principle of law is clear enough, and has often been stated both in this court and in the Court of Appeal. I have considerable doubt whether the justices really understood it, or how, if they did, they could have come to the conclusion at which they arrived.

I desire to add one cautionary note about cases of this kind. Adultery is a defence to charges of desertion and of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. So is a reasonable belief, honestly maintained, by a husband in his wife's adultery. In this case, no affirmative defence of adultery was raised. The omission is not, perhaps, surprising, since, on the evidence before the justices, it would appear to have been quite impossible to have presented even a prima facie case of adultery. The husband, therefore, was driven to rely on the defence of reasonable belief in his wife's adultery. In my view, the defence of reasonable belief in a wife's adultery is one which in most circumstances is not susceptible of easy proof. Nor should it be. It falls into the category of charges which may be easy to make and less easy to disprove. Here the husband produced virtually no evidence on which a charge of reasonable belief could be founded. Nevertheless, before the justices he succeeded. I believe it to be implicit that in cases like this, where the defence is reasonable belief, the defence should be fully and completely proved, and that unless it is so proved it should be rejected.

I agree with my Lord that this appeal must be allowed, that the husband be found to have wilfully neglected to provide his wife with reasonable maintenance, and that the matter be remitted to the justices to establish the amount of maintenance to be awarded.

Appeal allowed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

RASPIN v. RASPIN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Karminski, J.), May 6, June 8, 1953.]

Divorce—Adultery—Evidence—Hotel bill and register—Evidence of hotel witness.

A The husband stated to the wife that he had committed adultery and showed her a hotel bill, and on Mar. 3, 1953, the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery at the hotel with a woman unknown. At the hearing the hotel register was produced and a waiter gave evidence that he had seen the husband in bed with a woman who was not the wife. The suit was adjourned for further inquiries to be made, and it was discovered that after the date of filing the petition the husband had committed adultery with a married woman.

B HELD: where there was no evidence of a background of an adulterous association the court was not always prepared to make a finding of adultery where a hotel bill and a hotel register were produced and a hotel witness was called to give evidence, but in the circumstances of the present case C the court was satisfied that the husband had committed adultery and the wife was entitled to a decree.

AS TO DIVORCE ON THE GROUND OF ADULTERY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 660-665, paras. 972-978; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 311-332, Nos. 2591-2758.

D UNDEFENDED PETITION by the wife for dissolution of the marriage.

The parties were married in 1937, and there were two children of the marriage. In January, 1953, the wife left the husband after he had stated to her that he had committed adultery and had shown her a hotel bill. On Mar. 3, 1953, the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery at the hotel with a woman unknown, and prayed for the discretion of the court to be exercised in her favour. On May 6, 1953, the petition, which was E undefended, was heard by KARMINSKI, J., the hotel register was produced, and a waiter from the hotel gave evidence that he had seen the husband in bed with a woman who was not the wife. KARMINSKI, J., adjourned the case for further inquiries to be made by the wife's solicitors, and, as a result, it was discovered that after the presentation of the petition the husband had F committed adultery with a married woman. On June 8, 1953, the hearing of the petition was resumed.

Sheen for the wife.

In the course of the proceedings,

G KARMINSKI, J.: Where there is no background of an adulterous association I am not always prepared to make a finding of adultery where a hotel bill has been produced and a witness from the hotel is called to say that two people were in the bedroom together. I am speaking only for myself, but where solicitors want to get a decree in that sort of case they have to satisfy me of a background. In this case, until I showed signs of anxiety, nothing was done. Then steps were taken to find out what was the true position. H I then discovered that the husband had committed adultery with a married woman—on one night at Scarborough and on a subsequent occasion he spent the night with her in his own home. He may be living with her openly. I do not know, and I am not concerned with that, but when one comes to examine the case, the realities seem to me to be entirely different from the case as originally presented to me.

Sheen: These allegations are of adultery with the married woman after the date of the petition. At that date the wife's solicitors, although they did make inquiries, were not in a position to name a woman. They then had no evidence other than the hotel evidence. According to the wife's evidence, she had no reason to suspect anything before that time, and one would assume, in the normal course of things, that the association between the husband and the married woman would probably take a little time to develop into one in which adultery was committed.

KARMINSKI, J.: I repeat that this case has given me some anxiety A because all the facts as we now know them were not available at the last hearing. I appreciate that some of them may have come into existence not very long before the first hearing of the suit. Sometimes when a cause is presented in this way the suspicions of the court are aroused that the adultery, so called, committed at a hotel is merely a cover to screen what I may term the real adulterous association with a known woman. I have little doubt that that is B what the husband wanted in this case. I am prepared to exercise my discretion in the wife's favour, and I shall grant a decree nisi because I am satisfied now that the husband has committed adultery.

Decree nisi.

Re ABERCONWAY'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. McLAREN v. ABERCONWAY (BARON) AND ANOTHER. SAME v. SAME. D

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.),
May 15, 18, 19, 1953.]

Settlement—Powers of tenant for life—Limitation tending to discourage exercise of powers—Application of income under personalty settlement for benefit of settled land—Limitation over on land ceasing to be settled—Sale of settled land—Settled Land Act, 1925 (c. 18), s. 106 (1) (b). E

A settlor, by a settlement (the Bodnant settlement) dated Sept. 15, 1921, settled the Bodnant estate (except Bodnant Hall and the gardens, pleasure grounds and demesnes usually occupied therewith) on trust for A. for life with remainder to his issue. By a further settlement, dated Feb. 22, 1926, the settlor directed the trustees to hold certain shares on trust for sale and to invest the proceeds and to hold the shares and investments on the trusts of the Bodnant settlement, but provided that, if the gardens at Bodnant should be settled on, or acquired by the trustees on, the trusts of the Bodnant settlement, then "during so much of the lives of the children and grandchildren of the settlor living at the date of this indenture and the lives and life of the survivors and survivor of them and the period of twenty-one years from the death of such survivor as the said gardens at Bodnant shall be and remain settled as aforesaid or shall remain vested in the trustees or trustee (which portion of the said period of lives and years is hereinafter referred to as 'the prescribed period') the trustees or trustee shall with the consent of the person or persons for the time being beneficially entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the freehold hereditaments settled by the Bodnant settlement of 1921 apply F the income of the premises hereby settled and of the investments and property from time to time representing the same (all of which are together hereinafter referred to as 'the settled fund') in or towards securing and assisting and developing the use of the said gardens at Bodnant for the cultivation of plants and flowers of home and foreign countries of botanical and horticultural interest . . ." It was further declared that as from the expiration of the prescribed period the settled fund should be held on G other specified trusts. On Jan. 4, 1933, the settlor died, and by her will directed that Bodnant Hall and the gardens, pleasure grounds and demesnes forming part of the Bodnant estate not settled by the Bodnant settlement should be held on substantially the same trusts as were declared by the Bodnant settlement. On Nov. 11, 1949, the tenant for life sold five-sixths of the gardens to the National Trust.

A HELD: on the sale to the National Trust of the greater part of the gardens at Bodnant it could no longer be said that "the said gardens at Bodnant" remained settled on the trusts of the Bodnant settlement within the meaning of the settlement of 1926, and the "prescribed period" then ceased; (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) as the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106 (1) (b), did not operate to render void directions which determined provisions which were neither for the benefit of any cestui que trust nor in strictness ancillary to the enjoyment by the cestui que trust of the trust property, the provisions terminating the prescribed period in the event which had happened were not void; and, therefore, the shares should be held on the trusts operative on the cesser of the prescribed period.

APPEAL by the second defendant, one of the trustees of a settlement made on Oct. 28, 1909 (called "the Prestatyn settlement"), and CROSS-APPEAL by the first defendant, the tenant for life under a settlement dated Sept. 15, 1921, from an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated Nov. 5, 1952, reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 981, made on an originating summons issued to determine whether on the true construction of a settlement dated Feb. 22, 1926, made by Lady Aberconway, and in the events which had happened, (i) the period therein defined as "the prescribed period" had expired, and, if so, on what date it expired; and (ii) the declaration therein contained providing that after the expiration of the prescribed period the settled fund should be held on the trusts declared by the Prestatyn settlement of 1909 was deemed to be void under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106. DANCKWERTS, J., held that the prescribed period had come to an end, but that the limitation over tended to discourage the sale of the gardens by the tenant for life and was, therefore, void.

G C. Montgomery White, Q.C., and Burnett-Hall for the second defendant, a trustee of the Prestatyn settlement.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and H. E. Francis for the first defendant, the tenant for life in possession, Lord Aberconway.

Rawlence for the plaintiff, a trustee of the settlement of 1926.

H SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The problem to which this appeal gives rise is one of considerable difficulty and springs certainly from most unusual circumstances. It relates to certain settled property in Wales, which may be called for present purposes the Bodnant estate, of which the present Lord Aberconway is the tenant for life. The first settlement, however, that it is material to note does not relate to the Bodnant estate and has been called the Prestatyn settlement, which was made on Oct. 28, 1909. The settlor in that case, as in the case of all the subsequent settlements, was Lady Aberconway, the mother of the present Lord Aberconway. The trusts of the Prestatyn settlement have not been stated, and for the purposes of this appeal they are irrelevant. It is sufficient that on the date I have mentioned that settlement was made, certain land being conveyed to trustees on trust for sale. The second defendant and the appellant in this court, Raymond Patrick Johnson-Ferguson and the first defendant, Lord Aberconway, are the present trustees of that settlement.

I pass to the next settlement, which has been called the Bodnant settlement, made on Sept. 15, 1921, again by Lady Aberconway. That was a realty settlement of the Bodnant estate of which (as I have earlier stated) Lord Aberconway, the first defendant, is the present tenant for life in possession. It is, however, of the essence of the present case that the subject-matter of that settlement excluded from its scope the mansion house itself and certain other property, including the gardens and park-land which were occupied therewith. It does not appear that the extent of those exclusions was precisely defined in the settlement.

I now come to the third settlement, which has been called the Garden settlement, the construction and effect of which is the matter which the court has to determine. That third settlement was again a settlement made by Lady Aberconway, and was dated Feb. 22, 1926. Its subject-matter was a number of shares, but for present purposes it may be conveniently referred to as a settlement of a capital sum of £20,000. I shall come back later to examine more closely the exact language of the settlement, but putting it briefly the settlement was directed to these purposes. It was stated that until the gardens, pleasure grounds and certain other property mentioned in the settlement should become subject to the trusts of the Bodnant settlement of 1921, or to trusts having the like effect, the £20,000 should be held by the trustees of the settlement as though they were capital moneys which had arisen under the Bodnant settlement. So far, then, and until the event contemplated occurred, the tenant for life of the Bodnant settlement (now Lord Aberconway) would be entitled to receive the income of the £20,000. But on the happening of the stated event, viz., that of the gardens, etc., becoming subject to the trusts declared by the Bodnant settlement, a trust of a very particular character came into operation. The father of Lady Aberconway was a Mr. Pochin, who had been an ardent and expert horticulturist, and whose tastes had been inherited by his daughter. In truth, the gardens at Bodnant had by that time become what may be called show gardens, in that plants and shrubs of beauty and rarity had been grown, and from time to time horticulturists and others were accustomed to visit these gardens. The particular trust to which I have alluded was a trust whereby Lady Aberconway hoped that the income of the £20,000 could be applied in promoting the continuity of these gardens as a horticultural exhibit (if I may use that phrase) of notability. Such a purpose is not, I assume (and the settlor obviously assumed), a charitable object, and, therefore, the trusts for promoting the continuity of that enterprise were limited, first by reference to a period which would be within the so-called rule against perpetuities. There was, however (though I do not now pause to state it), a limitation on the extent of that period. At the end of the period so limited the settlor provided that the £20,000 should not revert to the Bodnant settlement as capital moneys, but should go over so as to become part of the subject-matter of the first (1909 or Prestatyn) settlement.

I have said enough to show that it was the settlor's intention, plainly expressed, that from the time that the gardens became settled property thenceforward the tenant for life of the Bodnant settlement should, in no circumstances, be entitled to enjoy the income of the settled £20,000 as part of the subject-matter of the Bodnant settlement. It will have been appreciated from what I have already said that at the date of the Garden settlement in 1926 these gardens and the mansion house itself were not settled property; they were the absolute property of Lady Aberconway. By her will, made on Dec. 2, 1931, she settled the mansion house and these gardens and the other properties excluded from the Bodnant settlement. There is no question but that, subject to certain provisions relating to a mausoleum (which I need not further mention), the terms of her will were such as to be for material purposes identical with the terms of the Bodnant settlement of 1921.

- A Lady Aberconway died on Jan. 4, 1933, and in the result the gardens and the mansion house then in effect became part of the Bodnant settled estates, and at the same time the special trust specified in the third (or Garden) settlement came into operation. To make the narrative complete, it should be stated that, at the time when Lady Aberconway died, the first Lord Aberconway was still alive. He died in January, 1934, and the present Lord Aberconway
- B thereupon succeeded as tenant for life. In fact, in October, 1934, Bodnant Hall and the gardens and the rest of the Bodnant settled estates became vested in the first defendant (the present Lord Aberconway) as tenant for life. The next event, and the only other event which need be stated, is that in 1949, in the exercise of his statutory powers of sale, the tenant for life sold to the National Trust the greater part (approximately five-sixths) of the gardens which
- C had been cultivated and developed in the way I have already stated. The result has been to leave subject to the Bodnant settlement trusts only a relatively small part of the whole of what had originally been these show gardens. But it is quite clearly proved in evidence that, owing to increasing costs, the whole income of the £20,000 is required and is usefully spent in maintaining only the retained part of these gardens.

- D The problem which has arisen is this: first, according to the construction of the third (or Garden) settlement of 1926, has the prescribed period come to an end as a result of the sale of the bulk of the gardens to the National Trust? If it has, then, according to the language of the settlement, the result will be that the £20,000 will go over so as to be held by the Prestatyn settlement trustees on the trusts of the Prestatyn settlement. If it has not come to an end, then
- E prima facie the particular or special trust continues, and the trustees will, no doubt, apply the income of this fund, or so much of it as they think fit, towards the cultivation and otherwise in regard to the retained part of these gardens. But a second point has been taken, viz., that, if according to the true construction of the Garden settlement the effect of the sale to the National Trust is to terminate the "prescribed period" in the Garden settlement, then the
- F relevant provision of the settlement is a provision or disposition which offends against the terms of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106, and must, therefore, be treated as void. On that view, it is argued, the result is either that the trustees of the Garden settlement continue to apply the income of the £20,000 for the retained part of the gardens, or that the £20,000 will again become part of the Bodnant settlement funds, the income of which will be enjoyed by the
- G present tenant for life, Lord Aberconway.

- DANCKWERTS, J., came to the conclusion on the first question that, according to the true construction of the Garden settlement, the "prescribed period" had come to an end as a consequence of the sale, but (on the second question) he thought that the provision of the Garden settlement which caused it so to do was offensive to s. 106, and concluded in favour of the first alternative
- H consequence which I have mentioned, viz., that the trustees continued to be entitled to the possession and the disposition of the income of the £20,000. In his view, they were entitled to apply the income of the fund to the retained part of the gardens, and, perhaps, also (though he did not so decide) towards the cultivation of that part of the gardens which had been sold to and was the property of the National Trust. Against that decision the second defendant (one of the trustees of the Prestatyn settlement, as I have indicated) has appealed.

I must now refer in detail to the terms of the Garden settlement, but I will preface my references by saying that, in my opinion, the view of its construction taken by DANCKWERTS, J., was correct. The settlement first recited the existence of the Prestatyn settlement, and next the existence of the Bodnant settlement, using as regards the latter this phrasing:

"Whereas by an indenture dated Sept. 15, 1921, [and then the parties to it are stated] certain hereditaments in the counties of Denbigh and Carnarvon known as the Bodnant estate (except the messuage or mansion house known as Bodnant Hall with the gardens pleasure grounds and demesnes usually occupied therewith and the home farm adjoining or near thereto) were settled . . . And whereas the settlor [Lady Aberconway] is seized in fee simple of the said mansion house known as Bodnant Hall with the gardens pleasure grounds and demesnes usually occupied therewith And whereas the late Henry David Pochin the father of the settlor and the settlor herself encouraged the use of the gardens at Bodnant aforesaid for the cultivation of a large collection of plants and flowers of home and foreign countries of botanical and horticultural interest and for experiments in the production and hybridization of plants and of flowers of all kinds and it is the settlor's desire that the gardens at Bodnant should continue to be used for the cultivation production and hybridization of foreign and domestic flowers and plants and the continuance of such experiments and the development of the results therefrom and the settlor is of opinion that it may be necessary for the furtherance of such objects that money should be expended in the erection and heating of greenhouses for the growth of rare plants and in other directions hereinafter more particularly mentioned And whereas the said gardens at Bodnant aforesaid are visited by a large number of visitors many of whom are specially interested in horticulture . . ."

The next following recitals relate to the sum settled, and I come, accordingly, to the operative part of the deed. The first few lines may be passed over, because they consist of directions as to selling the shares transferred and as to re-investment. The first operative trust is in these terms:

"the trustees shall hold the investments from time to time representing the same . . . upon the same trusts and with and subject to the same powers and provisions as capital moneys subject to the Bodnant settlement of 1921 are or might be held . . ."

Then follows in the form of a proviso this all important language:

"Provided always that if the said gardens at Bodnant shall be settled upon or shall be acquired by or become vested in the trustees or trustee upon the trusts declared by the Bodnant settlement of 1921 concerning the freehold hereditaments thereby settled or substantially upon the same trusts . . . then during so much of the lives of the children and grandchildren of the settlor living at the date of this indenture and the lives and life of the survivors and survivor of them and the period of twenty-one years from the death of such survivor as the said gardens at Bodnant shall be and remain settled as aforesaid or shall remain vested in the trustees or trustee (which portion of the said period of lives and years is hereinafter referred to as 'the prescribed period') the trustees or trustee shall . . ."

with the consent of the tenant for life for the time being of the Bodnant settlement apply the income of the settled property

"in or towards securing and assisting and developing the use of the said gardens at Bodnant for the cultivation of plants and flowers of home and foreign countries of botanical and horticultural interest and for experiments in the production and hybridization of foreign and domestic flowers and plants of all kinds and the continuance and making of experiments in connection therewith and the development of the results thereof and for the purposes aforesaid the trustees or trustee may with such consent as aforesaid . . .”

(i.e., of the tenant for life) expend certain sums in the erection of greenhouses.

A There is a provision that they are not to be used for the purpose of growing certain fruits, and then the trust goes on,

“and the trustees or trustee shall have the complete and uncontrolled discretion as to the portion or portions of the said gardens in which the income of the settled fund shall from time to time be applied and as to the time of such application and as to the mode of such application . . .

B and the trustees or trustee shall have power at their or his discretion to impose as a condition of the application of the income of the settled fund or any part thereof for any of the purposes aforesaid that the person or persons for the time being entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the said Bodnant estate under the Bodnant settlement of 1921 shall permit visitors either of a class specially interested in horticulture or possessing any special qualification in connection with horticulture

C or at their discretion all visitors to visit and inspect the said gardens under such reasonable conditions . . . as the trustees or trustee may approve and if at any time the [tenant for life] shall decline to allow the said income to be applied for the purposes aforesaid or to permit such persons as aforesaid to visit and inspect the said gardens then and so often as the same shall happen the trustees or trustee shall apply the income of the settled fund as if the same were income of the property settled by the Prestatyn settlement . . .”

Finally comes the ultimate limitation:

E “And it is hereby agreed and declared that from and after the expiration of the prescribed period the settled fund shall be held upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions declared by the Prestatyn settlement of 1909 . . .”

It is conceded that the gardens at Bodnant became settled on the trusts of the Bodnant settlement on the death of Lady Aberconway and on the coming into operation of the trusts of her will.

F First of all let me apply myself to the construction of the Garden settlement. Nowhere is it stated either in this document or (as I have already said) in the Bodnant settlement of what exactly the gardens at Bodnant consisted. The phrase is used which I have already read, “gardens pleasure grounds and demesnes usually occupied therewith”, that is, with Bodnant Hall. Counsel for the tenant for life suggested it might mean “from time to time occupied therewith”, but I do not think it does so signify, and if it did it would create the difficulty that if Bodnant Hall itself were sold then automatically none of the gardens would be occupied therewith, so that in that event the special trust would automatically come to an end. But I think that the court is entitled,

G and, indeed, bound, in order to discover what was meant by “the gardens”, to take note of the evidence of what in fact were the “gardens” which were described in this settlement, being gardens (as the settlor states in her recital) which had been applied towards the cultivation of rare flowers, shrubs, etc. There is before the court, as an exhibit to one of the affidavits, a map showing the Bodnant gardens at the date of the settlement and as they have since been maintained, and, for my part, I think it is reasonably clear that the subject-matter which is referred to as “the gardens at Bodnant” in the Garden settlement means the gardens illustrated on this plan, and I shall proceed in the rest of my judgment so to assume.

From this plan, it appears that the total area of these gardens was, in 1926, approximately sixty-eight acres, and of that area some fifty-three acres were sold in 1949 to the National Trust, leaving fifteen acres unsold. It is, I think, not open to doubt that a sale of an unsubstantial part of these gardens could not affect the problem which we have to consider. What, however, has occurred is that fifty-three out of sixty-eight acres have been sold, and the question, therefore—and this is the first question of construction—is whether it can now be said that the gardens (what is described as “the said gardens at Bodnant”) are still settled under the terms of the Bodnant settlement. A

The matter is obviously not one which permits of much elaboration. The learned judge, as I have earlier indicated, decided that, as a matter of the construction of the deed, it could no longer be said that “the said gardens” were and remained subject to the settlement, when in truth and in fact fifty-three out of sixty-eight acres of them had been sold, and I, for my part, agree with that conclusion. It seems to me, in other words, that construing this settlement so as to extract from it its own definition of terms, “the said gardens at Bodnant” meant the subject-matter which is illustrated on this plan and which the settlor had described in the earlier recitals. It follows, therefore, that (unless the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106, applies so as to alter the result) the prescribed period has come to an end, for the period (it will be remembered) was only that part of the perpetuity period as the “said gardens” did remain settled according to the terms of the Bodnant settlement. B Prima facie, therefore, and apart from the effect of the section with which I am now going to deal, the last provision in the Garden settlement will come into operation, and, the prescribed period having expired, the settled fund should be held on the trusts of the Prestatyn settlement. C

I come now to the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106. Its terms are familiar, and it is (so far as relevant) a re-enactment without alteration of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 51. It will be convenient for me to read sub-s. (1): D

“If in a settlement, will, assurance, or other instrument executed or made before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act a provision is inserted—(a) purporting or attempting, by way of direction, declaration, or otherwise, to forbid a tenant for life or statutory owner to exercise any power under this Act, or his right to require the settled land to be vested in him; or (b) attempting, or tending, or intended, by a limitation, gift, or disposition over of settled land, or by a limitation, gift, or disposition of other real or any personal property, or by the imposition of any condition, or by forfeiture, or in any other manner whatever, to prohibit or prevent him from exercising, or to induce him to abstain from exercising, or to put him into a position inconsistent with his exercising, any power under this Act, or his right to require the settled land to be vested in him; that provision, as far as it purports, or attempts, or tends, or is intended to have, or would or might have, the operation aforesaid, shall be deemed to be void.” E

Of those two paragraphs, (a) and (b), it is clear that para. (a) refers to a direction in express terms which seeks to forbid the tenant for life to exercise any of his statutory powers, whereas para. (b) relates to provisions which may obliquely have a similar effect. There is no question but that we are not concerned with para. (a) in this case, because there is no direction or similar provision within the meaning of that paragraph. The question is whether the very generous language of para. (b) is such as to affect some, and, if so, what, of the dispositions in this settlement so as to render them void. F

In approaching this matter, certain things may, in my judgment, be stated as clear. It cannot, I think, be a relevant consideration to consider the particular personality or the particular inclinations of the tenant for life for the time being. Obviously a tenant for life who has particular interests or particular hobbies G may have his mind affected so as to deter him from doing one thing or another, whereas another tenant for life with dissimilar tastes would be quite unmoved by similar considerations. Equally, as it seems to me, it must be quite irrelevant that, in the events which have happened here, the sold part of the gardens is now vested absolutely in the National Trust. As things now are it appears that the National Trust are continuing the upkeep of the gardens. In point of fact, Lord Aberconway has provided them with an endowment of £36,000 to that end. But in testing whether the provisions of para. (b) operate so as to render void any part of this settlement, I think the problem has to be considered objectively, and counsel for the tenant for life did not contend to the contrary. Any other view, it seems to me, would produce absurd results, because the same provision would be held void at one moment and fully effective at another, according to the particular circumstances and characteristics of the particular tenant for life.

It is necessary, in my judgment, to consider this matter having regard to the fact that the sale might well have been, not to the National Trust, but, say, to a farmer who would be using the land for agricultural purposes, or an industrialist who might be using it for mining or other industrial purposes. But before I examine the deed to inquire what are the provisions which are said to be struck at by para. (b), I note that DANCKWERTS, J., who concluded that s. 106 did render void that part of the settlement which caused the limitation over to the Prestatyn trusts to take effect, expressed the view (as I have already stated) that as a consequence the trustees of the Garden settlement were entitled to apply the income of the £20,000 exclusively to the retained part of the gardens—for which, indeed, it is required, as is shown by the evidence—though he thought also that it might be (though he expressed no conclusion) that they could apply the income of the £20,000 towards the upkeep of that part of the gardens which was now vested in the purchasers, the National Trust. It seems to me that that part of the judge's conclusion is open to the objection that it involves construing for the purpose the words, "the said gardens at Bodnant", in a sense quite different from the sense in which the learned judge construed them for the purpose of deciding whether, according to the terms of the trust, the prescribed period had come to an end. That does not seem to me to be legitimate. If the judge was right (and I think he was) in saying that "the said gardens" no longer remained settled as aforesaid, then it seems to me to follow that the phrase, "the said gardens" must equally mean substantially the whole of the said gardens, when used in the later part of the particular trust,

Counsel for the tenant for life argued that, assuming that the earlier phrase (which cut down the perpetuity period) must be treated as void, then since the words "the said gardens" must mean the same throughout, the special trust had, therefore, become impossible of performance, with the result that (in the absence of any provision covering that event) the original or first trust persisted, and, accordingly, that Lord Aberconway was now entitled as tenant for life of the Bodnant settlement to enjoy the income of the £20,000. No doubt he would (as far as I know he certainly would) apply it towards the upkeep of the gardens, but still he would be entitled beneficially to the income. The trustees would, on this view, have no further control or interest in the matter. If that view is right, then it follows that the one thing would have happened which, it seems to me, the settlor made quite clear she did not wish to happen, viz., that after the settlement of the gardens the Bodnant beneficiaries should have any claim to any part of the £20,000 or its income. But the argument is not without serious force, for if it is the fact that these trusts have become incapable of performance, then there is nothing in the deed which, so far as I can see, makes provision for that event, so that prima facie the original or primary trust would take effect. But the argument seems to me to have a strong bearing on the determination of the question: Does s. 106 apply in this case at all?

An argument was put forward by counsel for the trustee of the Prestatyn settlement (though not, I think, strongly pressed) that s. 106 could not apply in the circumstances of this case on the ground that if a provision is to be deemed to be void, then it must be deemed to be void ab initio, and since this settlement was executed in 1926 but had no truly effective operation until 1933, that condition could not here be satisfied. I hope I have properly apprehended the argument, but I do not myself accept it, and I hope that counsel will forgive me if I say no more about it but pass on to what seems to me to be the main question to be decided.

There is no doubt that the language of s. 106 (1) (b), which I have already read, is of very wide import, but some limitation, I think, plainly must be placed on it, for it cannot have been the intention of Parliament to put an almost unlimited restriction on the powers of persons desiring to make settlements of their own property in the way they think best. Indeed, in the cases which have been decided on this section and on its predecessor (to which I shall briefly refer in a moment) a limitation clearly does emerge, and that limitation is in addition to the limitation which follows from what I have already said, viz., that the section must, in my view, be construed objectively and not by reference to the particular idiosyncrasies of particular tenants for life.

The first thing, of course, to determine—the obvious thing which must be determined—is which is the limitation in this settlement which is said to have this deterrent effect? It may be, I venture to think, a criticism of the argument on behalf of the tenant for life that there is no clear agreement between leading and junior counsel which is the power or disposition or limitation in this settlement in which they say is the vice which renders it void. I think they are inclined to favour the words “as the said gardens at Bodnant shall be and remain settled as aforesaid”. In other words, they would treat the prescribed period as covering the whole perpetuity period without the further limitation imposed by the words which I have quoted. I think that view involves them in a difficulty, which I have already adumbrated, and it seems to me to be serious. Suppose that the whole gardens were sold, then, according to this view, still the prescribed period would continue, yet beyond any question the special trust limited to operate during that period would have come to an end. That would leave the deed with a serious lacuna in it, for it would have made no provision whatever in the event I have supposed for the disposition of the income of the £20,000 during the remainder of the perpetuity period. Counsel can only escape from that difficulty by praying in aid the overriding operative effect of the primary trust, or, possibly, by having resort to a resulting trust in favour of the settlor. An alternative view put forward on behalf of the tenant for life is that the final limitation is void, or, perhaps, that the final limitation and the provision already quoted are together void, or void to some extent. It may be that a difficulty in discerning the precise provision which is avoided is not fatal to an argument based on s. 106. On the other hand, I think it is a serious objection to it, for prima facie s. 106 cannot, in my judgment, be invoked if the result is to require the substantial re-drafting of the main operative parts of a settlement or other instrument, or otherwise to alter substantially its expressed purpose and effect.

Of course, the argument as now presented by counsel for the tenant for life is made attractive by the particular circumstances of the present case. One cannot be unmoved by the considerations which now affect the mind of Lord Aberconway as counsel has presented them to us. The £20,000 or its income has not been for many years sufficient, so to speak, to endow the whole sixty-eight acres. It is all required by the retained part on which, as he says, the core of the garden enterprise is situated, for it is there that the breeding of the plants and the greatest exercise of horticultural skill is to be found. It is natural to feel sympathy for Lord Aberconway if the effect of this settlement in the events which have now happened is to deprive him of the means (at any rate) of influencing the use of the income of this £20,000 towards this garden enterprise, and if one only had to look at the events as they have now happened, it might be possible to pick out or excise from the settlement such words only as would be necessary to meet the present situation. But, in my judgment, it is a mistaken approach to place too much emphasis on the particular circumstances as they have now arisen. What may be thought very just and reasonable now might turn out to be very unjust and unreasonable in ten years' time when conditions might be quite different. In any event, as it seems to me, the argument of counsel for the tenant for life, or at any rate one aspect of it, leads to a conclusion which is so patently in conflict with the settlor's intention that I, perhaps, find less difficulty than I otherwise might in putting aside emotional considerations and applying myself to what I conceive to be the duty of the court, namely, to construe the terms of this deed as they have been written, and also to construe, according to the ordinary sense of the language, s. 106 of the Settled Land Act, 1925.

I have already done my best to perform the first part of that task, and, fortunately, in applying myself to the second part, I am not without guidance in authority. Two cases seem to me to be of great assistance to the court in this matter: Re Simpson (1), which was decided by SWINFEN EADY, J., in 1913, and Re Patten (2), which was decided in 1929 by ROMER, J. In my judgment, neither s. 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, nor s. 106 of the Act of 1925 (which has replaced it) should be taken as operating to render void directions in a settlement operating to determine other provisions in the settlement which are neither for the benefit (properly speaking) of any cestui que trust, nor even, in strictness, ancillary to the enjoyment by a cestui que trust of the trust property. In this case, the provisions of the Garden settlement during the prescribed period of what I have called the special trust may, no doubt, be regarded as indirectly for the benefit of the tenant for life, at any rate so long as the tenant for life happens to enjoy the amenities of a good garden or happens to be an amateur of horticulture. But it is important to bear in mind that the application of the income is wholly in the discretion of the trustees. It is true that the trustees were required to obtain the consent of the tenant for life, and that was natural enough. But to that observation must be added another, viz., that if the tenant for life (for reasons however good to him) did not give his consent to what the trustees proposed, then the whole fund went over, until he should change his mind, to the Prestatyn settlement. It was said in argument that, if the trustee of the Prestatyn settlement were right, then the tenant for life could allow the whole gardens to go to rack and ruin without incurring the risk of causing the prescribed period to determine, whereas that result would immediately follow on a sale by him of any substantial part of the gardens. But, in my judgment, the argument involves a misconception, a failure to apprehend that the management of the gardens is a matter for the trustees in their discretion. The tenant for life is not entitled to touch a penny of the income of the £20,000 nor to direct its application. True, he may decline to consent to any application which the trustees may propose, but in that event, by virtue of the later provisions of the deed (unless they are somehow said also to be void, which was not suggested), the fund goes over to the Prestatyn trustees. This trust is for a very special and particular object, not, as I assume, a charitable object, but a public object of somewhat similar character. Provisions, therefore, which have the effect of putting an end to it, seem to me to be very far removed from provisions which have the effect of putting an end to some trust under which a cestui que trust did, until he exercised a statutory power, in a true sense of the phrase, himself benefit independently.

That distinction is, I think, inherent in the first of the two cases I have mentioned, the decision of SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Simpson (1). The question there related to a bequest of a leasehold house to the testator's widow for occupation during her widowhood, together with a provision that during her occupation the rent, rates and outgoings, including repairs, should be paid for out of the general estate. The question was raised whether that limitation of the trustee's obligation to pay rent, and so on, during the widow's occupation could be said to be something which was a deterrent to the tenant for life's exercise of her statutory power of sale. The learned judge gave a negative answer to that question. He said ([1913] 1 Ch. 282):

"In my judgment the provision for payment of rent and outgoings does not fall within s. 51 [of the Settled Land Act, 1882] at all. It is merely an extra benefit conferred on the widow to enable her to reside in the house without the expense of these outgoings. It is true that while she was in occupation she was free from these outgoings, but I am of opinion that the provision conferring this extra benefit on her was not a provision tending to induce her to abstain from exercising her statutory power of sale within the meaning of s. 51."

That decision was in 1913. Its effect was to put a limitation on the very broad language of what was then s. 51 (1), to the effect that the deterrents contemplated in the section did not comprehend amenities and extra benefits of the kind to be found in Re Simpson (1), which, however much they might obliquely affect the mind of a tenant for life (for she would not get them if she sold the testator's house and bought herself another), did not serve to bring into operation the language of the section so as to enable the tenant for life to require the continued payment of a sum equivalent to the previous outgoings after exercise by her of her powers of sale—a result which would have required (as in the present case) a substantial re-casting of the beneficial trusts. Parliament, knowing (as we must assume that it knew) of that limitation put on s. 51 of the Act of 1882 by the courts, re-enacted the section in the same terms in 1925. Prima facie, therefore, the courts must construe s. 106 of the Act of 1925 in the way in which the previous section had been construed before it was re-enacted. But in any case ROMER, J., in Re Patten (2), in 1929 expressly approved the language and reasoning of SWINFEN EADY, J. In my judgment, that reasoning applies a fortiori to the present case. My conclusion, therefore, with all respect to DANCKWERTS, J., is that the provision putting an end to the trustees' discretionary power to apply the income in furtherance of this very special (what I have called quasi-public) trust is not a deterrent, and not a provision tending to induce the tenant for life not to execute any of his statutory powers, of the kind contemplated by para. (b) of s. 106 (1), and, therefore, that no part of the relevant terms of this Garden settlement ought to be deemed to be void within the meaning of that section.

The result, in my opinion, is that this settlement should take effect according to its terms, and, if I have construed those terms correctly, the result will be that the £20,000 must now be held on the trusts of the Prestatyn settlement. For these reasons, though I acknowledge the difficulty of the case and (if I may say so) the force of the argument of counsel for the tenant for life, I think this appeal ought to be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: There are some fine gardens at Bodnant in North Wales covering sixty-eight acres of land, which are famous, not only for their beauty, but also as a centre of botanical and horticultural research. In February, 1926, Lady Aberconway settled twenty thousand shares on trust to provide an income to go towards developing the gardens for experiment and research. Twenty-three years later her son, the present Lord Aberconway, found that with the high rates of taxation now prevailing he could not afford to keep up the whole of the gardens, so he came to a very sensible arrangement. He conveyed the pleasure part of the gardens, some fifty-three acres, to the National Trust and endowed it with a capital grant of £36,000, and he retained the rest of the gardens, some fifteen acres, in his own hands so as to carry on experiments and research. By so doing his mother's wishes would be fulfilled, visitors would be able to go into the pleasure part of the gardens as they always had done, and the money from the shares would go towards development and research. All seemed well until someone suggested that as a result of this arrangement the money from the shares was forfeited. It was said that the money could not be used for the retained part of the gardens at all, but had to go to some members of the family under an earlier settlement called the Prestatyn settlement. In order to resolve the difficulty the parties applied to the court, and DANCKWERTS, J., has held that the money can be used for the retained part of the gardens.

It is apparent that all this discussion has come about because the person who drew up the settlement in 1926 did not foresee what would have to be done twenty-three years later in order to keep the gardens in being; he did not foresee that part of them might have to be conveyed to the National Trust. Speaking for myself, I would forgive him for such a mistake, because I do not think that draftsmen of deeds can be expected to foresee everything any more than draftsmen of Acts of Parliament can be expected to do so. In those circumstances, I would myself have liked, if it could have been done, to have moulded the language of the settlement of 1926 so as to give effect to what I feel were the wishes of Lady Aberconway by making it apply, not only to the gardens as they stood in 1926, but also to any substantial part thereof, and the retained part is certainly a substantial part of them. But I am afraid that our strict rules of construction—and here I agree with DANCKWERTS, J.—do not permit of such a moulding. However, I agree with him that the same result can be reached by resort to the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106.

In approaching s. 106, I first ask myself what is the “provision” which is in question in this case? It is, I think, the provision by which the court is bound, on a strict construction of the settlement, to say this to Lord Aberconway: “If you sell a part of the gardens in the exercise of your powers as tenant for life, the income allocated to the gardens will cease altogether.” By way of contrast, it should be noticed that, if Lord Aberconway should allow a part of the gardens to fall into disuse, no such forfeiture would be incurred. The whole income would continue to be available for the gardens. In those circumstances, if a provision to the effect I have stated were inserted in the settlement in plain terms, it would, I think, obviously tend to induce Lord Aberconway to abstain from exercising his power to sell a part. It would mean that, rather than do the sensible thing of selling a part of the land, he would hold on to the whole and neglect a part. That seems to me to be the very thing which s. 106 was designed to avoid. The provision which I have stated is not expressed in plain terms in the settlement, but it is the construction which the court feels bound to put on it. It cannot make any difference, however, whether the provision is expressed in plain terms or in obscure terms. By the statute it is deemed to be void.

Then comes the most difficult question in the case. When the provision is avoided, what is to happen to the trusts of the settlement? They cannot remain intact. The settlement says that the income is to be applied to “the said gardens”, i.e., to the whole gardens. After part is sold, that trust cannot be fulfilled to the letter, but we ought not, on that account, to let the trust fail absolutely. It would be most unfortunate if, when Parliament has enacted that a provision for forfeiture is to be avoided, the courts were to re-establish it by saying that you must still fulfil the letter of the original trust. By so doing, the courts would indirectly insist on the forfeiture which Parliament had abolished. Parliament must have intended that the trusts should be modified, so far as necessary to meet the new situation, or, in other words, to such an extent as is necessary to avoid the forfeiture. The words "as far as" in the section support this view, and I find nothing in the cases to deny it. A

In Re Patten (2) ROMER, J., modified the trusts so as to let Mrs. Patten have the use of the furniture even after she left the house. I recognise that, in some cases, no modification will be of any avail and the trusts will fail for want of any content. That is what happened about the money for rates and repairs in Re Simpson (1), Re Patten (2) and Re Burden (3). After the house was sold, the money could not be spent on rates or repairs to it at all, and so the trust failed altogether. Those cases would be applicable in the present case if Lord Aberconway had sold the whole of the gardens. The income would not then be spent on the gardens at all. The objects of the settlement would cease and the income would fall back into the Prestatyn settlement. But Lord Aberconway has not sold the whole. He has only sold a part, and the objects of the settlement can be well carried out in the part that he retains. B C

In his affidavit Lord Aberconway says:

"To continue the work which has in the past been, and is still being, carried on in the retained part of the gardens will, in my opinion, require an annual expenditure equivalent to the whole of the income of the Garden settlement fund. The continuance of such work is essential if the area as a whole is to continue to fulfil the purposes indicated in the recitals to the Garden settlement as being the 'objects' for which the gardens were endowed. Such work can only be carried on effectively in the retained part of the garden." D

It seems to me, on that evidence, that the trusts which were originally intended by the Garden settlement can be carried out now in the retained part. The only modification necessary in the trusts is to make them apply to the retained part instead of the whole gardens. That is, I think, quite permissible. E

I find myself, therefore, in agreement with DANCKWERTS, J., and I would dismiss the appeal. F

ROMER, L.J.: The judgment which the Master of the Rolls has just delivered expresses my views on this appeal so precisely that there is little that I can add to what he has said.

It seems to me that to accept the argument which was presented to us on behalf of the tenant for life involves our disapproving the reasoning of SWINFEN EADY, J., in 1913 in Re Simpson (1), to which my Lord has referred. The decision in that case was the law until 1925 when the provisions which existed in 1913 under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 51, were re-enacted without any relevant alteration by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 106, from which I gather that the legislature did not think it necessary or proper to disturb the law as so laid down by SWINFEN EADY, J. In 1929 ROMER, J., in Re Patten (2) expressly approved the reasoning of SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Simpson (1). I myself in the Chancery Division in 1948, in Re Burden (3), in addition to recognising that I was bound by these previous decisions, expressed my belief that they were right, and I take the opportunity in this court of affirming that view. G H

The case before SWINFEN EADY, J., Re Simpson (1), was one in which indirect benefits of a substantial character were conferred on the tenant for life of the leasehold dwelling-house which was the subject-matter of the specific bequest which the testator made in favour of his widow. Under that bequest there was a direction that she should have the right to occupy the dwelling-house during her life, and that the trustees should pay the ground rent and all rates, taxes and outgoings payable in respect of the said dwelling-house and do all necessary repairs, it being his wish that his wife should be personally relieved from the payment of the ground rent, rates, taxes and outgoings, cost of repairs, and the observance and performance of certain covenants.

A Now, notwithstanding the considerable degree of benefit which derived from that bequest to the widow, SWINFEN EADY, J., in the passage to which my Lord referred in giving judgment, said ([1913] 1 Ch. 282):

B " . . . the provision for payment of rent and outgoings does not fall within s. 51 at all. It is merely an extra benefit conferred on the widow to enable her to reside in the house without the expense of these outgoings. It is true that while she was in occupation she was free from these outgoings, but I am of opinion that the provision conferring this extra benefit on her was not a provision tending to induce her to abstain from exercising her statutory power of sale within the meaning of s. 51."

C If that view be right (which I believe it to be), it is much clearer, in my opinion, that the provisions in the present settlement are not within s. 106 of the Act of 1925. As I have already pointed out, in Re Simpson (1) the benefits attaching to the house—and I say "to the house" with deliberation, because they were not attached to the income of the life tenant as an accretion to such income or, indeed, to the life tenant at all; they were attached to the property—were considerable benefits and such as might be expected to operate on a person's mind in deciding whether to sell or not, because if he did sell he would lose those benefits. Nevertheless, as I say, it was held (and I think rightly held) that they were outside the Act.

I turn to the provisions which were attached by Lady Aberconway's settlement to the gardens. The trustees were to have (in the words of the settlement)

E "the complete and uncontrolled discretion as to the portion or portions of the said gardens to which the income of the settled fund shall from time to time be applied and as to the time of such application and as to the mode of such application."

Therefore, the management of the gardens so far as this income was concerned was being taken out of the hands of the tenant for life and vested in the control of the trustees. Then in addition to that the trustees were to have power F "at their . . . discretion to impose as a condition of the application of the income of the settled fund" that visitors of categories to be selected by the trustees and nobody else should be entitled to visit and inspect the gardens. It was further provided, in connection with that, that, if the tenant for life declined

G "to allow the said income to be applied for the purposes aforesaid or to permit such persons as aforesaid to visit and inspect the said gardens", then the income was to be diverted elsewhere. It might suit some people to have gardens under the control of other people who had the sole right to say whether visitors should be allowed in, whether the public should be allowed to wander about, and to have no say themselves as to the manner in which the gardens should be run, but such persons, I venture to think, would have to be ardent horticulturists and persons who were prepared to accept with philosophy the views of other people as to the manner in which the gardens should be managed rather than their own.

H Now, it is the income with all those fetters attaching to it which is the subject of this disposition, and the loss of which it is suggested would operate so as to deter the tenant for life from exercising the statutory power of sale. If that be so, it is plain that SWINFEN EADY, J., was wrong in Re Simpson (1).

I am quite satisfied that this provision in regard to the income and the gift over of the income if the gardens ceased to be carried on in the way that was contemplated is not within s. 106 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, at all, and, accordingly, that the effect of the sale which the tenant for life carried out was in no way interfered with by the section, notwithstanding the fact that the income would no longer be applicable to the gardens.

I am, therefore, of opinion that s. 106 is outside this case altogether. If that be so, the rest follows as a matter of course. The tenant for life sold five-sixths of the gardens. DANCKWERTS, J., held (and, in my opinion, quite rightly held) that if five-sixths of gardens of this character are sold, then it is impossible to say the gardens still remain, and, inasmuch as the gardens no longer remain settled or vested in the trustees, then, on the very language of the final provision in the settlement, the income goes over to the trustees of the Prestatyn settlement for whom the appellant appears, and, accordingly, they now, in my opinion, are entitled to this income, and the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed; cross-appeal dismissed.

HAWKINS v. COULSDON AND PURLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pearson, J.), May 13, 14, 15, June 4, 1953.]

Negligence—Licensee—Need to prove knowledge by licensor of facts constituting danger—Reasonable appreciation of risk—Accident in dark—Risk obvious in daylight—Defective steps of requisitioned house—Liability of requisitioning authority.

On Oct. 5, 1951, the plaintiff, after visiting an occupier of part of a house which had been requisitioned since 1946 by the defendants, fell and broke her leg while descending the steps from the front door after dark. One of the steps was broken, a fact of which the defendants had knowledge, but the learned judge found that the defect was not obvious to the plaintiff and was not reasonably to be expected by her.

HELD: a licensee moving in the dark did not in all cases take the risk of any danger which in daylight would be obvious; to entitle the plaintiff to succeed it was enough for her to show that the defendants knew the facts constituting the danger and that a reasonable man, having that knowledge, would have appreciated the risk involved, and she need not show that the defendants in fact appreciated that risk; the plaintiff had discharged the burden which was on her; and, therefore, she was entitled to judgment.

ACTION for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty.

H In 1939 a house, No. 2, Valley Road, Kenley, Surrey, belonging to Mrs. Anne Elizabeth Jane Reddish, was requisitioned for civil defence purposes and was used as a first aid post. During the war it sustained war damage from bomb-blast, and was de-requisitioned. A war damage claim was made and some repairs were carried out. In August, 1946, the house was requisitioned by the defendants, the urban district council of Coulsdon and Purley, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, for housing persons who were inadequately housed, and a schedule of condition was prepared by an independent architect on behalf of the defendants, which was signed by the defendants' surveyor on their behalf and by Mrs. Reddish as owner. The schedule referred, inter alia, to the fact that the three stone steps of the front porch were worn and that one of them was broken at the corner. Between 1946 and 1951 the house was re-decorated and minor alterations and repairs were carried out in accordance with standards of repair laid down by the Ministry of Health, but nothing was done to the steps. No complaints were made to the defendants by the occupiers of the house about the condition of the steps. On Oct. 1, 1951, although the property was still requisitioned, the defendants allowed Mrs. Reddish to enter into occupation of the upper floor of the house. On the evening of Oct. 5, 1951, the plaintiff, Mrs. Eva Lilian Hawkins, came to visit Mrs. Reddish. She had visited the house before the war, but had not been there since its end. She left the house at about 8 p.m., when it was dark. As she was coming down the steps from the front door, she put her foot on the broken step which gave way beneath her and she fell and broke her leg. On the pavement outside the house there was a street lamp, but between the lamp and the front door there was a fir tree and on the night in question it was very dark and misty so that the lamp was not effectively lighting the doorway.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants, contending that by virtue of the requisition they were in occupation and/or control of the porchway, steps and approaches to the house; that she used them on the evening in question as the defendants' licensee, being on a visit to the person occupying the upper floor of the house under an agreement with the defendants; that the defendants owed her a duty to take reasonable care to prevent her from suffering damage on the occasion of that visit from any hidden danger or trap in the porchway, steps, or approaches of which they were aware; that the porchway and/or steps and/or approaches constituted at all material times a hidden danger or trap; that, as the defendants well knew, they were unlit, the surface was worn, and a large portion of the lowermost step had been previously broken off and was missing; and, in breach of their duty, and/or negligently, the defendants had failed to take reasonable care to prevent injury to persons using the steps. The defendants denied the allegations and contended that the plaintiff used the steps with full knowledge of their condition (as to which they made no admissions), and/or without keeping a proper look-out, and/or without due care for her own safety.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4. PEARSON, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: I make the following findings of fact or of mixed fact and law:—

(a) The defendants were in possession and control of the steps. (b) The plaintiff was using the steps as a licensee of the defendants. (c) The bottom step had been badly broken for at least a year and was dangerous, being likely to cause an accident, especially to a person descending the steps at night. The south end of the steps would be more frequently used, but the north end would be sometimes used, for instance, if two persons went down the steps together, or if one person intended to walk round the bonnet of a waiting car to the near side front passenger's seat. (d) Even if the lamp was lit, as I think it probably was, there was not enough light to enable a normally careful person, coming out of a well-lighted room and descending the steps on a dark night, to see that the bottom step was broken. (e) The badly broken step was a concealed danger to the plaintiff, who was using the steps by night and did not know that one of the steps was broken. (f) The plaintiff was not careless of her own safety either in failing to notice the broken step when she walked up on the other side of the steps shortly before lighting-up time on the same day, or in walking down the steps in the dark without waiting for a torch to be brought or for the headlights of the car to be turned on, or in any other way. Although she was not entitled to assume that the steps were in good condition, she could, in my opinion, reasonably assume that she would be treading on a step and not into a hole or on to loose and movable fragments of a broken step. (g) The accident was caused by the concealed danger constituted by the badly broken step and the deficiency of light. (h) The physical facts constituting the danger, namely, the badly broken step and the deficiency of light, were known to the defendants through their officers concerned with the condition of the requisitioned property. (i) A reasonable man, having the defendants' knowledge of the physical facts, would have appreciated the risk involved. (j) It was not proved, and I do not consider there are sufficient grounds for inferring, that the defendants appreciated the risk involved. If they had, they would, presumably, have incurred the small expense necessary to remove the danger by cementing in the broken pieces.

With regard to the position of a licensee walking in the dark there are numerous reported cases, including Hounsell v. Smyth (1) (relating to an open quarry on waste land); Wilkinson v. Fairrie (2) (relating to a staircase in a passage); Huggett v. Miers (3) (relating to an unlighted staircase in an office building); Lewis v. Ronald (4) (relating to an unlighted staircase); Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (5) (relating to dock premises); Coleshill v. Manchester Corpn. (6) (relating to a trench on a road in course of construction); Caseley v. Bristol Corpn. (7) (relating to an unfenced dock); Rochman v. J. & E. Hall, Ltd. (8) (relating to an unlighted lift). The subject is discussed in SALMOND ON TORTS, 11th ed., at p. 573, and in WINFIELD ON TORTS, 5th ed., at pp. 582, 583; and (in relation to invitees) in CHARLESWORTH ON NEGLIGENCE, 2nd ed., at pp. 194-196. The principle to be applied is stated by LORD SUMNER in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (5) as follows ([1923] A.C. 274):

"A licensee takes premises, which he is merely permitted to enter, just as he finds them. The one exception to this is that, as it is put shortly, the occupier must not lay a trap for him or expose him to a danger not obvious nor to be expected there under the circumstances. If the danger is obvious, the licensee must look out for himself: if it is one to be expected, he must expect it and take his own precautions. If he will walk blindfold, he walks at his peril, even though he is blindfolded by the action of the elements. As usual in cases of duties of care, the reasonable man is the standard on both sides. The licensor must act with reasonable diligence to prevent his premises from misleading or entrapping a licensee, who on his side uses reasonable judgment and conduct under circumstances that can be reasonably foreseen. The licensee is to take reasonable care of himself and cannot call a thing a trap, the existence of which a reasonable man would have expected or suspected, so as to guard himself from falling into it."

Applying that principle, I find that this badly broken step in an apparently ordinary short flight of front door steps was not obvious to the plaintiff, descending at night, and was not to be expected there in the circumstances, and was a danger, the existence of which a reasonable man, using reasonable judgment and conduct in the circumstances, would not have expected or suspected. In my judgment, there is no absolute rule of law that in all cases a licensee moving in the dark takes the risk of any danger which in daylight would be obvious.

Another question arises, which is one of law and presents considerable difficulty. To be entitled to recover, the licensee must show that the danger was known to the licensor. Is it enough for the licensee to show that the licensor knew the physical facts constituting the danger and that a reasonable man, having that knowledge, would have appreciated the risk involved? For convenience, I will call that "the objective test". If that is the right test to apply, the plaintiff succeeds on my findings set out above. Or is it necessary for the licensee to show, directly or by inference, that the licensor appreciated the risk involved? I will call that "the subjective test". If that is the right test to apply, the plaintiff fails. Interesting arguments on this question were presented by counsel for the defendants and by counsel for the plaintiff. The question was expressly left open by the Court of Appeal in Baker v. Bethnal Green Borough Council (9) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 140), and in Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (10) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 685). I, therefore, reserved judgment in this case and have investigated the earlier decided cases in search of guidance on this question.

In Bolch v. Smith (11) WILDE, B., made some observations on the liability of a licensor in respect of traps. He said (7 H. & N. 742):

"If A gives B permission to cross his yard in which there are several ways, and there is a pit in the yard which is usually covered, but on a particular night it being uncovered B falls into it, I can understand that A would be liable. But if the hole has always been uncovered, and B in broad day walks into it, would A be liable?"

and then he said (ibid., 746):

"That disposes of the case; but I will add that I do not mean to say that if the defendant had made a hole in the yard, and had covered it in a way that was insufficient, but which appeared to be sufficient, he would not have been liable. But here there was nothing of that character. The danger was open and visible; there was nothing which could be called a 'trap'."

Those observations are consistent with "the objective test", but were not necessarily intended to be a full statement of the facts required to be proved in order to establish the liability. In any case, they were obiter dicta.

In Indermaur v. Dames (12), which is the leading case on the liability of an invitor to an invitee, the judgment of the court (consisting of ERLE, C.J., WILLES, KEATING and MONTAGUE SMITH, JJ.) was delivered by WILLES, J., and contains the following passage (L.R. 1 C.P. 286):

"It is observable, that, in the case of Southcote v. Stanley (13), upon which much reliance was properly placed for the defendant, ALDERSON, B., drew the distinction between a bare licensee and a person coming on business, and BRAMWELL, B., between active negligence in respect of unusual danger known to the host and not to the guest, and a bare defect of construction or repair, which the host was only negligent in not finding out or anticipating the consequence of. There is considerable resemblance, though not a strict analogy, between this class of cases and those founded upon the rule as to voluntary loans and gifts, that there is no remedy against the lender or giver, for damage sustained from the loan or gift, except in case of unusual danger known to and concealed by the lender or giver."

That was an obiter dictum, but of the whole court, and the judgment was approved in the Court of Exchequer Chamber (L.R. 2 C.P. 311).

In Gautret v. Egerton. Jones v. Egerton (14) there was a demurrer to the declaration and the declaration was held to be insufficient. WILLES, J., in his judgment said (L.R. 2 C.P. 374):

"The plaintiff must, in his declaration, give the defendant notice of what his complaint is. He must recover secundum allegata et probata. What is it that a declaration of this sort should state in order to fulfil those conditions? It ought to state the facts upon which the supposed duty is founded, and the duty to the plaintiff with the breach of which the defendant is charged. It is not enough to show that the defendant has been guilty of negligence, without showing in what respect he was negligent, and how he became bound to use care to prevent injury to others. All that these declarations allege is, that the defendants were possessed of land, and of a canal and cuttings intersecting the same, and of certain bridges across the canal and cuttings communicating with and leading to certain docks of theirs; that they allowed persons going to and from the docks, whether upon the business or for the profit of the defendants or not, to pass over the land; and that the deceased persons, in pursuance of and using that permission, fell into one of the cuttings, and so met their deaths. The consequences of these accidents are sought to be visited upon these defendants, because they have allowed persons to go over their land, not alleging it to have been upon the business or for the benefit of the defendants, or as the servants or agents of the defendants; nor alleging that the defendants have been guilty of any wrongful act, such as digging a trench on the land, or misrepresenting its condition, or anything equivalent to laying a trap for the unwary passengers; but simply because they permitted these persons to use a way with the condition of which, for anything that appears, those who suffered the injury were perfectly well acquainted. That is the whole sum and substance of these declarations."

Then he said (ibid., 375):

"Assuming that these were private docks, the private property of the defendants, and that they permitted persons going to or coming from the docks, whether for their own benefit or that of the defendants, to use the way, the dedication of a permission to use the way must be taken to be in the character of a gift. The principle of law as to gifts is, that the giver is not responsible for damage resulting from the insecurity of the thing, unless he knew its evil character at the time, and omitted to caution the donee. There must be something like fraud on the part of the giver before he can be made answerable. It is quite consistent with the declarations in these cases that this land was in the same state at the time of the accident that it was in at the time the permission to use it was originally given. To create a cause of action, something like fraud must be shown. No action will lie against a spiteful man who, seeing another running into a position of danger, merely omits to warn him. To bring the case within the category of actionable negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty: otherwise, a man who allows strangers to roam over his property would be held to be answerable for not protecting them against any danger which they might encounter whilst using the licence. Every man is bound not wilfully to deceive others, or do any act which may place them in danger. It may be, as in Corby v. Hill (15), that he is responsible if he puts an obstruction on the way which is likely to cause injury to those who by his permission use the way: but I cannot conceive that he could incur any responsibility merely by reason of his allowing the way to be out of repair."

G KEATING, J., was of the same opinion.

WILLES, J., in his judgment in Gautret v. Egerton. Jones v. Egerton (14) and also in the earlier judgment delivered by him on behalf of the court in Indermaur v. Dames (12) was plainly using "the subjective test" and considered that it was necessary to apply "the subjective test". But that is not the end of the inquiry, because, since those judgments were given, there have been a number of cases in the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal on the subject of the liability of a licensor to a licensee, and these will have to be considered carefully.

The decision of the House of Lords in Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (16) gave rise to discussion and was authoritatively interpreted as based on findings or inferences that the children had access to the turntable with the leave and licence of the railway company, and that the turntable was a trap for the children: Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (17) ([1913]

1 K.B. 418-420, per HAMILTON, L.J.); Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor (18) ([1922] 1 A.C. 50, per LORD BUCKMASTER; per LORD ATKINSON (ibid., 53, 54); per LORD SHAW, ibid., 63; R. Addie & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (19) ([1929] A.C. 366, per LORD HAILSHAM, L.C.). The finding or inference of leave and licence will be found in the report of Cooke's case (16) per LORD MACNAGHTEN ([1909] A.C. 236); per LORD ATKINSON (ibid., 240); per LORD COLLINS (ibid., 241), where the word "invitation" is evidently not used in the technical sense of a common business interest but rather as meaning a licence coupled with allurement. The important feature of Cooke's case (16), for the present purpose of ascertaining what degree or kind of knowledge of the danger must be shown to have been possessed by the licensor, is that LORD MACNAGHTEN (ibid., 234), LORD ATKINSON (ibid., 238) and LORD COLLINS (ibid., 241) applied what I am calling "the objective test" as part of the reasoning leading to the conclusion in favour of the appellant. LORD MACNAGHTEN said (ibid., 234):

"The question for the consideration of the jury may, I think, be stated thus: Would not a private individual of common sense and ordinary intelligence, placed in the position in which the company were placed, and possessing the knowledge which must be attributed to them, have seen that there was a likelihood of some injury happening to children resorting to the place and playing with the turntable, and would he not have thought it his plain duty either to put a stop to the practice altogether, or at least to take ordinary precautions to prevent such an accident as that which occurred?"

It will be seen that the test applied there is to consider whether a private individual of common sense and ordinary intelligence, placed in the company's position and possessing that knowledge which must be attributable to the company, would have seen the likelihood of injury. Then LORD ATKINSON said (ibid., 238):

"The right may be only the restricted right of a bare licensee, or it may be the more extended right of a person invited. The principle that the owner of land upon which a licensee enters on his own business, or for his own amusement, is only responsible for injuries caused to the latter by hidden dangers of which the former knew, but of which the licensee was ignorant and could not by reasonable care and observation have detected, must, in any given case, be applied with a reasonable regard to the physical powers and mental faculties which the owner, at the time he gave the licence, knew, or ought to have known, the licensee possessed. To the blind the most obvious danger may be a trap. To the idiotic the most perilous act may appear safe and cautious. The duty the owner of premises owes to the persons to whom he gives permission to enter upon them must, it would appear to me, be measured by his knowledge, actual or imputed, of the habits, capacities, and propensities of those persons."

LORD COLLINS said (ibid., 241):

"I think there was evidence that the turntable, fastened as it was only by a bolt so easily withdrawn, was a dangerous thing for young children to play with, and that the defendants, as reasonable men, ought to have known it . . ."

It seems to me, therefore, that Cooke's case (16) includes a decision of the House of Lords in favour of "the objective test", in a case where there was a licence and a trap for children.

Next, there is a passage in the judgment of HAMILTON, L.J., in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (17) reading as follows ([1913] 1 K.B. 415):

"Two other terms must be alluded to—a 'trap' and 'attraction' or 'allurement'. A trap is a figure of speech, not a formula. It involves the idea of concealment and surprise of an appearance of safety under circumstances cloaking a reality of danger. Owners and occupiers alike expose licensees and visitors to traps on their premises at their peril, but a trap is a relative term. In the case of an infant, there are moral as well as physical traps. There may accordingly be a duty towards infants not merely not to dig pitfalls for them, but not to lead them into temptation. 'Allurements', too, is a vague word. It may refer only to the circumstances under which the injured child has entered the close. Here it is hard to see how infantile temptations can give rights, however much they may excuse peccadilloes. A child will be a trespasser still, if he goes on private ground without leave or right, however natural it may have been for him to do so. On the other hand, the allurement may arise after he has entered with leave or as of right. Then the presence in a frequented place of some object of attraction, tempting him to meddle where he ought to abstain, may well constitute a trap, and in the case of a child too young to be capable of contributory negligence it may impose full liability on the owner or occupier, if he ought, as a reasonable man, to have anticipated the presence of the child and the attractiveness and peril of the object."

The last sentence of that passage, referring to the standard of the reasonable man, was expressly cited with approval in Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor (18) ([1922] 1 A.C. 50, per LORD BUCKMASTER and per LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE (ibid., 63)). There is also, in the speech of LORD SHAW, the sentence (ibid., 61):

"Where the dangers are not familiar and obvious, and where in particular they are or ought to be known to the municipality or owner, special considerations arise."

In R. Addie & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (19) LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., referred to the judgment of HAMILTON, L.J., in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (17) as ([1929] A.C. 367): "a judgment with which I find myself in full agreement".

E

It thus appears that in the case of a child licensee the "objective test" is to be applied in deciding whether the licensor had knowledge of the danger. Is there any reason for applying a different test in the case of an adult licensee? There are possible differences between a child licensee and an adult licensee with regard to the inference of leave and licence, the existence of a trap, and the sufficiency of the warning. But I cannot see any reason why any different test should be applied in deciding whether the licensor had knowledge of the danger. Moreover, there is at least some indication of the "objective test" applying to the case of an adult licensee in the passage which I have already cited from LORD SUMNER's speech in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (5), containing the words ([1923] A.C. 274):

"As usual in cases of duties of care, the reasonable man is the standard on both sides. The licensor must act with reasonable diligence to prevent his premises from misleading or entrapping a licensee, who on his side uses reasonable judgment and conduct under circumstances that can be reasonably foreseen."

G

In Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (20), LORD ATKINSON (ibid., 86, 89), and LORD WRENBURY (ibid., 96), said that a licensor is liable in respect of dangers of which he knew or ought to have known. In Sutcliffe v. Clients Investment Co. (21), in the Court of Appeal, it was said that the words "or ought to have known" in the above-mentioned passages from the speeches in Fairman's case (20) should be regarded as inserted per incuriam. In R. Addie & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (19) LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., said ([1929] A.C. 365) that a licensor is liable in respect of dangers of which he knew or ought to have known. But the Court of Appeal again said in several cases that the words "or ought to have known" were inserted per incuriam:

H

Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council (22) ([1937] 3 All E.R. 606); Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (23) ([1937] 3 All E.R. 456); Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (24) ([1941] 3 All E.R. 181); Sutton v. Bootle Corpn. (25) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 96).

With regard to this apparent conflict of opinions, LORD GREENE, M.R., said in Baker v. Bethnal Green Borough Council (9) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 140):

"Counsel for the respondent put forward what I must confess at first sight appears to me to be a very attractive explanation of that difficulty. What he said was that, if a licensor knows of the existence of what in fact is a trap or a hidden danger, that is sufficient, because he cannot be heard to say that although he knew the physical facts which constituted the danger from a purely objective point of view, the fact that it was a danger did not occur to his mind. In other words, that when the phrase 'or ought to be known' was used, it was directed to that view of the position, and refers, not to the physical objective facts, but to the circumstances that those facts constitute a danger. That appears to me to be a very attractive view, but much though I should like to do so, I do not find it necessary to consider whether it is correct or not. It would be necessary to explore with some care the earlier authorities on the subject of licensor and licensee before accepting it. I am prepared to deal with this case on the hypothesis that in order to fix a licensor with liability it is necessary to bring home to him not merely knowledge of the facts which constitute the danger, but his own knowledge that those facts do constitute a danger."

In Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (10) (in the Court of Appeal), the question was again discussed ([1950] 1 All E.R. 683-685) and left undecided. I should, of course, have been glad if it had been possible still to leave it undecided in this case, in view of the conflict of opinions which has been revealed by the examination of the previously decided cases. But for the purposes of the present case a decision on this question cannot be avoided. Having regard to the findings of fact which have been set out above, my conclusion, from examination of the previous cases, is that there is sufficient House of Lords authority in favour of "the objective test" to justify and require its application here. The licensor is not liable if, through lack of adequate inspection, he has failed to ascertain the existence of the physical facts which constitute the danger. But if the licensor does know of the physical facts which constitute the danger, and a reasonable man, having that knowledge, would appreciate the risk involved, the licensor is not excused by his own failure to appreciate the risk involved.

Applying that principle here, on the findings of fact which I have set out above, I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed against the defendants for the agreed sum of damages, which is £1,000, and there will be judgment for the plaintiff for that sum.

HAR-SHEFI (orse. COHEN-LASK) v. HAR-SHEFI.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pearce, J.), June 15, 1953.]

Nullity—Jewish bill of divorcement—Declaratory judgment sought that marriage dissolved—Parties domiciled in Israel—Divorce recognised by law of Israel.

A The wife, a Jewess, was born in England and domiciled there before her marriage. The husband, a Jew, was domiciled in Israel. On Jan. 10, 1950, the parties were married at the Chief Rabbinate at Tel Aviv. In October, 1950, the wife returned to England, and in February, 1951, the husband came to this country. On Sept. 6, 1951, in the presence of the Beth Din, in London, the husband handed to the wife a bill of divorcement. In December, 1951, the husband was deported to Israel, where he married again. On a

B petition by the wife for a declaration that the marriage had been validly dissolved on Sept. 6, 1951,

C HELD: the divorce on Sept. 6, 1951, was a valid divorce according to Jewish Rabbinical law and, therefore, valid according to the law of the parties' domicile, namely, Israel; the wife had resumed her English domicile after that divorce; and, accordingly, the court had jurisdiction to make, and now made, the declaration sought.

G PETITION by the wife for a declaration that her marriage had been validly dissolved on Sept. 6, 1951, by a Jewish bill of divorcement before the Beth Din in London.

On May 16, 1952, the wife, who was resident in England, filed the petition. On July 2, 1952, the husband, who was resident and domiciled in Israel, purported to enter an appearance, but was unable to provide an address within the jurisdiction, and the wife applied ex parte by summons for leave to proceed

H with the petition. On Oct. 29, 1952, BARNARD, J. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 821), dismissed the summons. The wife appealed, and on Mar. 6, 1953, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal ([1953] 1 All E.R. 783), holding (i) that under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5, the court had jurisdiction to make a declaratory order even though no other relief was sought, and, therefore, it had jurisdiction to entertain a petition which sought only a declaration that a foreign decree of divorce was valid, and (ii) that the English courts could hear evidence of the law of Israel, on which the validity of the divorce, and, consequently, the domicile of the wife, depended, and so determine whether or not the divorce was valid by that law.

The husband did not appear.

PEARCE, J.: This is a petition by a wife for a declaration that her marriage was validly dissolved on Sept. 6, 1951, by a Jewish divorce before the Beth Din in London. The wife, a Jewess, is an Englishwoman born in England, and domiciled there before her marriage. The husband, a Jew, has at all times been domiciled in Israel. They met in 1949 when she was on a visit to Israel, and on Jan. 10, 1950, they married according to Jewish law at the office of the Chief Rabbinate at Tel Aviv. In October, 1950, she came to England, and there had a child in December, 1950. The husband followed her in February, 1951. The marriage broke down, and on Sept. 6, 1951, there was a Jewish divorce between the parties whereby in the presence of the Beth Din the husband handed to the wife a bill of divorcement. This divorce was duly entered in the records of the Beth Din. In December, 1951, the husband was deported to Israel where he married again. The wife wishes for a declaration that the divorce was valid in order that she may marry again in this country.

It was originally held ([1952] 2 All E.R. 821) by the judge on summons that this court had no jurisdiction to make a declaration as to matrimonial status unattached to any other claim for relief, and, further, that, as the husband was domiciled in Israel, this court had no jurisdiction to consider the validity of the husband's divorce. But the Court of Appeal by a majority held ([1953] 1 All E.R. 783) that this court has declaratory jurisdiction even though no other relief is sought. It also held that this court has jurisdiction to hear the petition, notwithstanding the fact that the husband is domiciled in Israel, if the wife is domiciled in England. The answer to the question whether she is domiciled in England must depend on the validity of the divorce, since, if it is valid, the wife may have resumed her English domicile. It is, therefore, necessary for the court to investigate the validity of the divorce by the law of Israel in order to decide whether the wife is domiciled here and whether there is jurisdiction in this court.

It has been proved before me that the wife was domiciled in England before her marriage. Once she establishes that that marriage has been dissolved it becomes possible for her to resume her English domicile and no very cogent evidence is needed to establish that resumption. The time that she spent in Israel was short. She insisted on coming back to England before the birth of her child, and when after the divorce her husband was deported from England she remained in England and has made her life here. On the evidence it seems to me that, provided that the validity of the divorce is proved, she has resumed her English domicile.

I am satisfied on the evidence of the senior ecclesiastical judge of the Rabbinical Court of the Beth Din in London that the divorce duly took place before that body on Sept. 6, 1951, and that it was a valid divorce according to the Jewish Rabbinical law although it was in no sense a judicial investigation. I am satisfied by the evidence of an expert in the law of Israel that the civil courts of that country are prohibited from granting a decree of divorce and that exclusive jurisdiction is given to the Rabbinical courts on matters of marriage and divorce concerning members of the Jewish faith domiciled in Israel. Divorces made in the Rabbinical courts are recognised as valid, and this particular divorce would be regarded as valid according to the law of Israel.

In my view, this court must recognise the validity of that divorce. In DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 371, it is stated:

"There is also no authority which has any direct bearing on the question whether English courts will recognise as valid divorces which are effective under the law of the domicile of the parties although they are not the outcome of judicial proceedings, or of legislation preceded by a judicial inquiry. In Preger v. Preger (1) and Spivack v. Spivack (2) the invalidity of Jewish religious divorces was taken for granted, but in each case the domicile appears to have been English. In Sasson v. Sasson (3) the Privy Council held that the divorce of Jewish British subjects domiciled in Egypt effected through the Grand Rabbinate at Alexandria was valid under the relevant ordinances, while the Hammersmith Marriage Case [R. v. Hammersmith Superintendent Registrar of Marriages. Ex p. Mir-Anwaruddin] (4) contains dicta which suggest that a monogamous marriage must be dissolved by the decree of a court in order that the divorce should be recognised in England. In these circumstances, the question whether the English courts would recognise divorce by consent or unilateral declaration of a type which was at one time possible under the law of the Soviet Union, even if it is effective under the law of the domicile, is a matter of pure conjecture. In view of the paramount importance of the law of the domicile in questions of status, it is submitted that if such divorces are recognised as valid in the country of the domicile, they should be recognised as valid in England. If the cause for divorce is immaterial so ought the method to be . . . It is therefore submitted that, provided the divorce is of a type appropriate to a monogamous union, it ought, on principle, to be recognised in England if it is valid under the law of the domicile, whatever be the method by which it was obtained."

Sasson v. Sasson (3) is a guide to the case now before me. In that case the parties were British subjects of the Jewish religion resident in Egypt. They were divorced by the Grand Rabbinate at Alexandria in accordance with the Jewish religion. The appeal was from His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court at Alexandria and the appellant was asking for a declaration that the divorce was valid. Under the statute governing that court it had no power of divorce, but it had a duty in all matters relating to marriage or other questions involving religious law and custom to recognise and apply the religious law or custom of the person concerned. The Privy Council made the declaration asked for. LORD DUNEDIN said ([1924] A.C. 1009):

"The situation, therefore, was this. The court had no jurisdiction itself to dissolve a marriage. It had, however, jurisdiction to declare rights and, in matters relating to marriage (which obviously include divorce), it was bound in the case of persons not belonging to Christian communities to recognise and apply the religious law and custom of the persons concerned. It is not necessary to cite the various cases in which the power of courts to divorce a vinculo has been discussed. The case of Le Mesurier (otherwise Gordon) v. Le Mesurier (5) finally settled that the proper and only court is the court of the domicile."

In the case before me the marriage has been validly dissolved by the only form of divorce which is open to a Jew domiciled in Israel. To hold that a marriage, which has been legally dissolved according to the law of the domicile, continues binding in this country is to create confusion and hardship, and is, in my opinion, contrary to the principle laid down in Le Mesurier (otherwise Gordon) v. Le Mesurier (5), and the principles of international law. I make the declaration as asked.

Solicitor: G. Parry-Jones (for the wife).

RICH AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Hodson and Morris, L.JJ.), April 22, 1953.]

Negligence—School—Duty of education authority to pupil—Pupil injured on school premises—Liability of authority.

The infant plaintiff was a pupil at a school under the care and management of the defendants. An unfenced heap of coke lay in one of the school's playgrounds and the infant plaintiff was injured by a piece of coke thrown at him by another boy. In an action for damages for negligence it was found that the school authorities had exercised adequate supervision over the boys.

HELD: the duty owed by the defendants to the boys was to take such care of them as a careful parent would exercise in like circumstances; they were under no obligation to prevent the boys having access to the coke by erecting fencing or other similar means; their supervision of the boys had been held to be adequate; and, therefore, they were not liable to the plaintiff.

Jackson v. London County Council & Chappell (1912) (76 J.P. 37, 217), distinguished.

Principle stated by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Williams v. Eady (1893) (10 T.L.R. 42), applied.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of SLADE, J., dated Dec. 2, 1952.

The plaintiffs were Derek Anthony Rich, an infant pupil at the Montem Street School, Tollington, London, N.4, and his father, Sidney Leonard Rich. The defendants, the London County Council, as education authority, had many schools under their care and management, including the school attended by the infant plaintiff. Owing to the difficulties during and after the war in obtaining regular supplies of fuel, it was essential for the school authorities to keep at the school quantities of fuel in hand in excess of the amount that could be stored in the storage places provided, and at the material time there was an unfenced heap of coke in the senior playground amounting to some three tons. On Feb. 16, 1950, the infant plaintiff was hit by a piece of coke thrown by another pupil as a result of which he lost his left eye. In an action against the London County Council for damages for personal injuries, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had been negligent in that "the defendants their servants or agents failed to provide adequate or proper supervision while the children were playing in the said playground. The defendants their servants or agents failed to fence in or safeguard against interference by children the said heaps of coke, well knowing that the said children were in the habit of playing on the heap of coke and using pieces thereof as missiles." SLADE, J., found, inter alia, that in the circumstances the defendants were obliged to keep the heap of coke in the playground and that there was adequate supervision of the children by the school staff. He held, however, that the defendants had been negligent in failing to take any steps to protect the coke or to prevent the boys from having access thereto, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and F. H. Lawton for the defendants.

Berryman, Q.C., and S. I. R. Craig for the plaintiffs.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendants has submitted that the judgment of SLADE, J., is wrong, that it goes too far, and that it places too high a duty on those who manage and conduct a school such as this was. Counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs has submitted that this was a question of fact for the decision of the learned judge, and that there was evidence on which he could come to the conclusion at which he arrived. I need hardly say that a finding of fact by the judge of first instance based on the evidence of witnesses whom he sees and hears will always receive full consideration in this court, and it is only if this court is satisfied that the conclusion of the judge is wrong that it will interfere. Counsel is right to a large extent in describing this question as a question of fact, but before a proper decision can be reached on that question of fact it is necessary to ascertain the measure of duty owed to a child by those responsible for the management of a school.

The learned judge was of the opinion that the defendants were obliged to store additional coke somewhere, and, as there was no place under cover in which they could put it, they put it in the senior boys' playground. The fact that there was this heap of coke in the senior boys' playground was an anxiety and a burden to the teachers and to the school authorities. The head mistress had complained and reports had been made from time to time. It was known that children often throw missiles at one another. The little boy who lost his eye was asked about it, and he said that he knew that things should not be thrown and that he would be punished if he did throw things. The school keeper said, in his evidence, that whenever he found boys playing on the coke he chased them away. They were a little out of hand until January, 1950, when a new headmaster came.

As I have said, SLADE, J., found that there was no practical alternative for the county council to adopt. They had to have a heap of coke in the yard. Further, he found that the infants were supposed to keep to their own part of the playground, and not to go into the playground which was for older children. He found that there was adequate supervision, and he accepted the evidence of the head mistress and of the other mistresses and helpers who were called that there was adequate supervision and that no supervision would have prevented this accident, for children will do some things at a time when the teacher's back is turned. He found, further, that the boys knew that they would be punished if they threw missiles, and he said:

"The question resolves itself into whether something ought to have been done physically to prevent access to these dumps of coke so long as they remained in playgrounds accessible to children, and to as many as two hundred and seventy children in the infants' school alone."

The judge referred to the case to which our attention has been directed, Jackson v. London County Council & Chappell (1). The facts in that case were that a contractor, who was to carry out certain repairs at a public elementary school, left a quantity of rough material composed of sand and lime in a truck in a corner of the school playground. The head master of the school gave instructions to the school caretaker to have the material removed, as he considered that it was dangerous, and the caretaker telephoned the contractor asking him to remove it. When the boys came out of school the material had been left unguarded, and one of the boys threw a portion of it at the plaintiff, who was also a scholar at the school, injuring his eye. In an action by the plaintiff against the education authority and the contractor for damages, it was held that there was evidence on which the jury could find both the education authority and the contractor guilty of negligence. When the facts are examined, it would appear that the head master's anxiety was lest a boy should play with the truck itself and tip it up in some way. That in fact happened, and, after the truck had been tipped and the mixture in it was strewn about, the boys threw pieces at each other. The contractor had failed to do what the head master had asked him to do. Thereafter it was difficult for the head master to say that he did not think it was dangerous, and it could be said that he owed a duty to the boys to have the danger removed, if danger there was. The action was against both the contractor and the London County Council, as the education authority. After verdict the question was raised whether there was evidence to go before the jury, and BRAY, J., in giving judgment, said that he had grave doubt whether there was any evidence of negligence in the case fit to go to the jury. He told the jury that they must be reasonably satisfied that the accident which happened was one which might reasonably have been anticipated by the defendants and guarded against. The real question was whether there was any evidence as to that. It was so much a question of degree that it was difficult to say when near the boundary line on which side the case fell. It was more a question of fact than of law. After giving judgment for the amount awarded by the jury, £50, his Lordship added that he had so much doubt about the case that there would be a stay of execution without any terms in order to give the defendants an opportunity of appealing. There was an appeal which came before a court consisting of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, FARWELL and KENNEDY, L.JJ. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., having read the questions that had been left to the jury and their answers, said (76 J.P. 218) that the effect of them was that the jury must have found that the barrow was a dangerous thing to leave where it was. He did not know whether the jury were influenced by sentimental sympathy in favour of the boy. The evidence against the schoolmaster was that he recognised the barrow as a source of danger, and with regard to the contractor it was clear from the evidence that he was told to take some steps to remove the barrow, but that he had not acted sufficiently. In his judgment, the appeal failed and must be dismissed, and FARWELL and KENNEDY, L.JJ., agreed. It appears that in both the court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal grave doubt was felt as to the result. It is not clear whether there was a submission before the case went to the jury that there was no evidence fit for the consideration of the jury. The matter was argued after verdict, and BRAY, J., although he was in very considerable doubt, thought that there was sufficient evidence to go before the jury, and the Court of Appeal held that the jury's verdict could be supported. That is as far as the case goes. I venture to point out that the case differs on its facts from this case in that something unusual had been brought on to the school premises, viz., a laden truck, and the head master's fear was that the boys might play with that truck and cause some damage or hurt themselves. In this case there was a heap of coke, as there had been since about 1941, for until 1950 the difficulties of getting regular supplies of coke had not been overcome even by the London County Council.

We have to consider whether or not the judgment of SLADE, J., can be supported on the facts proved before him and accepted by him. Perhaps the most important of his findings is that there was adequate supervision. There was a large number of pupils in the infants' side of this school, but there were plenty of people to supervise them, and they were properly supervised during their playtime. That is the finding of the learned judge. Having considered the authorities, he adopted the test stated by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Williams v. Eady (2). That was an action by a boy against a schoolmaster for an injury alleged to have been caused by his negligence in leaving a bottle of phosphorus about. LORD ESHER, M.R., said (10 T.L.R. 42):

" . . . as to the law on the subject there could be no doubt; and it was correctly laid down by the learned judge, that the schoolmaster was bound to take such care of his boys as a careful father would take of his boys, and there could not be a better definition of the duty of a school-master."

That test has been the one adopted ever since. SLADE, J., continued:

A “I feel sympathy with the London County Council for the position in which they found themselves, with adequate reasons for storing the coke where they did, no practical or practicable alternative, adequate supervision (as I have found), adequate exhortation and instructions (as I have found). But with the knowledge that they had, and, if they did not have it, with the knowledge that they ought to have had (and I am satisfied that they did have it), what should they have done, bearing in mind their duty to which I have already referred? It seems to me that there were only one of two things that they could have done to discharge that duty, and that is: (i) remove the coke from the playgrounds, or B (ii) take steps to ensure that it was no longer accessible to the boys. If they could not do (i), then they could have done (ii). They need not have put up a wire fence in case it had the risk which Dr. Topping envisaged. What they could have done was to put up some form of fence or wooden structure which would have, for all practical purposes, prevented the boys from having access to the coke . . . Posing the question to myself: What C would a careful father have done towards his own son, with knowledge of that risk which his son was running being pointed out to him over and over again; would such a father have left the coke there unprotected, with the consequences which the father knew might ensue and which, in due course, did ensue? I answer the question by saying that no careful parent would so have acted, and I accordingly find that the defendants were negligent in not taking steps to protect the coke or prevent the boys from D having access to the coke.”

E I cannot accept that. It seems to me that it is putting much too high a burden on the education authority, and, in my view, it is stating the way in which a father would approach the duty to his children in too general a way. I wonder how many yards in private houses or attached to public buildings have been without some fuel in the yard or yards in recent years. One who looks from a window in this building can see coke or some other fuel in the yard. It has F to be kept there, I assume, because of the difficulty in getting regular supplies. That difficulty may be resolved. As the learned judge pointed out, it is regarded as a temporary difficulty, but he says that a careful father, looking on a matter of this kind, would say: “I must have this fenced for the safety of my children.” What expense would be incurred in the small back yard of a private house or what it would be in the case of one school in the London County Council area I do not know. I do know, however, from the evidence that no one said that an accident of this kind, arising from the throwing of coke, had ever happened before, and no one said that any infant was known to have taken a piece of G coke and thrown it at another child in this school before. Yet it is said that the duty of the education authority is either not to have the heap of coke there or to put up some form of fence or wooden structure which would, for all practical purposes, have prevented the boys from having access to the coke. That would mean putting up some structure over which boys could not climb, for, if it were something over which boys could climb, it would not, for all practical purposes, prevent the boys from having access to the coke. I cannot H accept that as the duty in these circumstances.

SLADE, J., found that the supervision at this school was adequate. The school keeper said that there had been no trouble in regard to the coke since the new head master came in or about January, 1950, approximately a month before this accident. An accident of a most unfortunate kind occurred, but I do not see that the defendants can be blamed for it. If this be a question of fact, I am bound to say that I take a different view from that of the learned judge, but I am not sure that it is wholly a question of fact. It is necessary to look at the test which SLADE, J., laid down. He found that in the circumstances the duty on the London County Council was to do one of two things: either to remove the coke or to take steps to ensure that it was no longer accessible to the boys. I do not agree with that. If their supervision was adequate, it was not necessary that they should take steps to ensure that the coke was no longer accessible to the boys. Their duty was to exercise the care which a careful parent would exercise in the like circumstances. On the evidence in this case I do not find that they failed in that duty. For those reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The learned judge, in a very careful judgment, directed himself perfectly accurately as to the law when he said, quoting LORD ESHER, M.R., in Williams v. Eady (2), that a master was bound to take such care of his pupils as a careful father would take of his children, and he sought to apply that standard to this case. In doing so, he first considered the question of supervision and said:

"First, I am satisfied that there was adequate supervision of the infants during the breaks and on this occasion. Miss Price (the teacher in charge) was there the whole time actually standing in the bay where the infants were supposed to remain except for the purpose of going to the lavatory. If they went to the lavatory, there was Mrs. Logan, the infants' helper, again to shepherd them and to prevent them from going astray, that is to say, where they were not supposed to be. It so happened that another boy had chosen, about the same moment, to run his head into a wall, and Mrs. Logan's attention was temporarily taken up with attending to that boy, as, indeed might always happen whatever degree of supervision she could exercise. It is sufficient for me to leave it at that and to say that I am satisfied that the supervision was adequate, and I am satisfied, moreover, that no supervision, even if more than adequate, would have prevented this accident. One can supervise as much as one likes, but one will not stop a boy being mischievous when one's back is turned. That, of course, is the moment that he chooses for being mischievous. Secondly, I am satisfied that Miss Camburn [the head mistress of the infants' school] did everything that she possibly could in the way of instruction, exhortation, and threat of punishment, and I am further satisfied that Malcolm, when he threw this piece of coke, and Derek, when he was about to throw it back again, knew perfectly well that they were doing wrong and that they would be punished or would be liable to be punished if they were caught."

Having arrived at that finding of fact and having found that it was reasonable for the London County Council to have coke stored on the premises, the question is whether the learned judge was right in going further and demanding of the defendants something more than the supervision which he had already said was adequate. With all respect to him, I think that in that the learned judge fell into error. In his judgment he said:

"But with the knowledge that they had, and, if they did not have it, with the knowledge that they ought to have had (and I am satisfied that they did have it), what should they have done, bearing in mind their duty to which I have already referred? It seems to me that there were only one or two things that they could have done to discharge that duty and that is: (i) remove the coke from the playgrounds, or (ii) take steps to ensure that it was no longer accessible to the boys. If they could not do (i), then they could have done (ii) . . . What they could have done was to put up some form of fence or wooden structure which would have,

for all practical purposes, prevented the boys from having access to the coke."

A The impracticability of keeping children from access to missiles by the erection of physical barriers has only to be stated to be reasonably obvious, in my view, and one would have thought that on this footing this case was very difficult to argue. One has only to envisage the difficulties of a master taking a party of children to the seaside—an argument which, we are told, is led when one considers means which might have to be employed to prevent children picking up missiles. I think that the only crumb of assistance which the plaintiffs have been able to obtain in this case is derived from the fact that in Jackson's case (1), to which my Lord has referred, an accident occurred
B in circumstances not wholly dissimilar from those in this case and the plaintiff succeeded. I would draw attention to the fact that the only decision there was that there was some evidence on which the jury could arrive at the conclusion at which they did arrive and that, so far as the short report of the case goes, it does not appear that any steps were taken to supervise the children or to guard against the accident which did occur. On the contrary, in this C case the evidence was strong, and it was accepted by the learned judge, that so far as supervision was concerned the steps taken were adequate, and so far as exhortation and instruction were concerned again adequate steps were taken directed to this particular point, namely, the throwing of missiles. In my judgment, therefore, treating this matter as an exceptional case in which this court is taking a different view of the facts from that taken by the learned D judge who carefully examined them in the first instance, this appeal must be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I have reached the same conclusion. It is common ground between the parties in this case that it was the duty of the London County Council, as the education authority, to act as a reasonable, careful and solicitous parent would have acted in the circumstances. The learned judge E towards the end of his judgment poses for himself the question how a careful parent would have acted and whether such a parent would or would not have left the coke unprotected. Counsel for the plaintiffs has emphasised before us the consideration that Miss Camburn appreciated that there were risks attendant on the accessibility, within the area of the school premises, of the pile of coke.
F Not unnaturally Miss Camburn, as a careful head mistress, desired to protect herself in every possible way, and she called the attention of those above her to the possibility that the presence of the coke might lead to some unfortunate circumstances. The question that is raised in this appeal is whether it can be said to be negligent in a reasonable, careful and solicitous parent to permit the accessibility to a child of something that may conceivably be used as a missile if every reasonable supervision is exercised over the child.* In my G judgment, such a question must be answered having regard to the facts and circumstances of each case. It is of great consequence in this case to have in mind that the learned judge has found that there was nothing lacking in the supervision of the children and in the measure of exhortation that was given to them. But he came to the conclusion that on the facts of this case a careful parent would not have left the coke unprotected. As this is a question which, H in my judgment, can be determined equally well by this court, having all the evidence and the findings of fact before us, as it could have been determined by the learned judge, I feel free to form my own conclusion, which differs from that reached by the learned judge. This was a case where everything reasonably possible that could be done was being and had been done to look after the children. It is true that there is a propensity in children to throw things. Their ingenuity in finding things to throw may be difficult to circumvent.
It seems to me that it cannot be said that it is the duty of a reasonable, careful, and solicitous parent to endeavour to put a child into a straight jacket or to seek to remove from his reach anything that may conceivably be used by him to indulge his mischievous propensity, always provided that reasonable, proper, and adequate supervision over the child is exercised. I do not consider that it has been shown that in this case the defendants fell short in the fulfilment of the duties which lay on them.

Appeal allowed.

SHELDON v. BROWN BAYLEY'S STEEL WORKS, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Barry, J.), June 15, 1953.]

Writ—Service—Service after more than twelve months from date of issue—Unconditional appearance by defendants—R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1.

By R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, "No original writ of summons shall be in force for more than twelve months from the day of the date thereof, including the day of such date; but if any defendant therein named shall not have been served therewith, the plaintiff may, before the expiration of the twelve months, apply to the court or a judge for leave to renew the writ . . . and a writ of summons so renewed shall remain in force and be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, and for all other purposes, from the date of the issuing of the original writ of summons."

A widow, whose husband had been killed in an accident, commenced an action against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, by a writ which was not served on the defendants until more than twelve months after the date of issue. The defendants entered an unconditional appearance.

HELD: the service of a writ after the expiration of the time prescribed by the rule was not an irregularity which could be rectified by waiver; a writ so served was ineffectual for all purposes; and, therefore, the service on the defendants was a nullity and they were entitled to have it set aside.

APPEAL by plaintiff to judge in chambers from an order of a master setting aside the service of a writ, adjourned into open court for judgment.

- A On Oct. 12, 1950, the plaintiff's husband, Leslie Sheldon, was killed in an accident. On Oct. 3, 1951, the plaintiff commenced an action against the first defendants, Brown Bayley's Steel Works, Ltd., and the second defendants, Dawnay's, Ltd., by the issue of a writ claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The plaintiff's solicitors alleged that service of the writ on the second defendants was effected within twelve months after the date of the issue of the writ, as required by R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, by the posting of a copy of the writ and of the statement of claim to the second defendants' registered office on Oct. 1, 1952. The second defendants contended that the writ was not received at their registered office till Oct. 7, 1952, by which date the period of twelve months had expired. On Oct. 13, 1952, however, they entered an unconditional appearance, and on Nov. 25, 1952, they issued a summons to set aside the service of the writ. The master set aside the service of the writ on the ground
- C that the writ had been served after the expiration of twelve months from the date of its issue. The plaintiff appealed against this order, contending that, even if service was not effected on the second defendants within twelve months of the date of issue, that irregularity had been waived by the second defendants by their unconditional appearance to the writ and it was now too late for them to ask for the service of the writ to be set aside.
- D The first defendants also alleged that the writ had been served on them more than twelve months after the date of its issue. They entered a conditional appearance, and service on them was subsequently set aside. The plaintiff did not appeal against this order.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and Hayman for the plaintiff.

N. Lawson for the second defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

- E BARRY, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found that the writ was not served on the second defendants within twelve months from the date of its issue, and continued: R.S.C., Ord. 8, r. 1, provides:

- F "No original writ of summons shall be in force for more than twelve months from the day of the date thereof, including the day of such date; but if any defendant therein named shall not have been served therewith, the plaintiff may, before the expiration of the twelve months, apply to the court or a judge for leave to renew the writ . . ."

After dealing with the procedure for renewal the rule concludes with these words:

- G " . . . and a writ of summons so renewed shall remain in force and be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, and for all other purposes, from the date of the issuing of the original writ of summons."

- H In the present case the plaintiff made no application for the renewal of the writ within twelve months from its date. Under Ord. 64, r. 7, the court has power to enlarge this time and to renew a writ at some later period. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, very rightly conceded that in all probability, to put it at its lowest, the court would not have exercised this jurisdiction in the plaintiff's favour (had it been asked to do so) in respect of the cause of action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as any enlargement of time would have deprived the defendants of their accrued right to rely on the period of limitation imposed by s. 3 of that statute. Counsel for the plaintiff relies on Ord. 70, r. 1, which provides that non-compliance with the Rules of the Supreme Court does not render any proceedings void, and argues that, by entering an unconditional appearance, these defendants have done for the plaintiff what the court would not have done, and have, in effect, precluded themselves from questioning the validity of the writ served on them. Counsel for the second defendants concedes that, if the defect in the writ had been a mere irregularity falling within the terms of Ord. 70, r. 1, such defect would have been waived, and so cured, by the defendants' unconditional appearance. In the present case, he says the writ was not merely irregular or defective—it was a nullity and void, or, at least, entirely ineffective as a means of commencing an action, and cannot be made effective by unconditional appearance or by any other step taken by the defendants: ex nihilo nihil fit. It is thus necessary for me to consider the true effect of Ord. 8, r. 1, and, in particular, whether an unrenewed writ, served more than twelve months after the date of its issue, is one which is defective only on account of irregularity or is wholly inoperative and void.

In support of his argument, counsel for the plaintiff placed considerable reliance on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Kerley, Son & Verden (1) and on the note to Ord. 8, r. 1, on p. 59 of the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, which purports to be founded on this decision. The note says that the words “ ‘No . . . writ . . . shall be in force’, etc.”, means “ ‘shall be in force for the purpose of service for more than twelve months’”, not that the writ ceases to be efficacious for any purpose whatever. If, he argues, the writ remains efficacious after twelve months for all purposes except service, and the defendants, in fact, accept service and enter an unconditional appearance, its sole disability has been remedied by waiver. Counsel for the plaintiff also relied on Lloyd v. Great Western Dairies Co. (2), in which the Court of Appeal held that failure to obtain the leave of the court before joining other causes of action with a claim for possession of land and mesne profits amounted only to an irregularity which could be, and had been, waived by the defendants. The court pointed out that the joinder of a cause of action for the recovery of land with some other separate claim was a form of action recognised by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and the rules, and was one which might be adopted by the leave of the court or a judge which could be given either before or after the issue of the writ. In seeking to apply this authority to the present case, counsel for the plaintiff points out that the plaintiff could have obtained an order for the renewal of the writ if she had applied within twelve months from its date, and the court would have had jurisdiction to renew after that period, albeit, as a matter of discretion, that relief would probably not have been granted in respect of any part of her claim that was already statute-barred. Thus, says counsel for the plaintiff, the defect in the present writ is confined, as in Lloyd's case (2), to a failure to obtain an order from the court demanded by the rules. In this, as in Lloyd's case (2), the defect amounts only to an irregularity, which has been waived by unconditional appearance. Counsel for the plaintiff also relied on Fry v. Moore (3) and Re Orr Ewing (4), but in neither of these cases was the validity of the writ in question, and they certainly do not carry his case any further than the two authorities to which I have already referred.

Counsel for the second defendants submitted that the matter was concluded in the second defendants' favour by the decision of the House of Lords in Smurthwaite v. Hannay (5) and the comparatively recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Battersby v. Anglo-American Oil Co., Ltd. (6). In the former case, separate and distinct causes of action of several plaintiffs were joined on the same writ. On an application by the defendants to stay or dismiss the action the plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that, if their joinder was unwarranted by the rules, this was a mere irregularity of which it was too late for the defendants to take advantage. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., dismissed this contention by saying ([1894] A.C. 501):

“ If unwarranted by any enactment or rule, it is, in my opinion, much more than an irregularity.”

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN dealt with the same question and said (ibid., 506):

"In my judgment, such joinder of plaintiffs is more than an irregularity: it is the constitution of a suit as to parties in a way not authorised by the law and the rules applicable to procedure; and apart altogether from any express power given by the rules, it is fully within the competence of the court to restrain and to prevent an abuse of its process."

A In Battersby's case (6), which related to the renewal of a writ after the period allowed for service had expired, LORD GODDARD used words which are directly applicable to the present problem. In discussing Holman v. Elliot (George) & Co., Ltd. (7), which the court refused to follow, LORD GODDARD said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 389):

B "Acceding to an argument advanced by the plaintiff, MAC KINNON, L.J., is reported as saying ([1944] 1 All E.R. 640): 'Mr. Fox-Andrews, for the plaintiff, points out, and I think with reason, that this is not a case where the order of the learned judge, in extending the period for the service of the writ, deprives the defendants of an accrued right of defence under Lord Campbell's Act. The right of defence by the limitations section . . .

C would arise if the writ had not been issued before Oct. 9, 1942. It was, in fact, issued on Oct. 7, 1942, two days before the expiry of the twelve months from the date of the accident.' With all respect, we are unable to agree that the issue of a writ which has become a nullity by reason of non-service within the prescribed time satisfies the section. If the writ has ceased to be in force the position is the same as if it had never been issued; otherwise we see no reason for the concluding words of Ord. 8, r. 1, which provides for a renewed writ preventing the operation of statutes of limitation. These words would be unnecessary if a writ which had expired and had not been renewed would answer that purpose. A new writ, issued more than twelve months after the date, would clearly be out of time, so either the writ originally issued must be renewed or the action is barred."

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that these words were obiter dicta, as it was unnecessary for the court to decide that the writ became a nullity unless served within the prescribed period. In a sense I think that this is so. The passage from the judgment of MAC KINNON, L.J., to which LORD GODDARD referred, was itself unnecessary for the decision in Holman's case (7), and it seems clear

F from the authorities cited that the Court of Appeal in Battersby's case (6) had ample authority for deciding that, in the circumstances under consideration, the writ should not be renewed without also deciding that the writ itself had become a nullity or that the position was the same as if it had never been issued. I am, however, bound to give weight to this clear expression of opinion, although it may not, in strictness, be binding on me. Indeed, be it binding on me or not,

G I am satisfied that it correctly represents the law in relation to this question. I find it impossible to hold that the service of a writ which is no longer "in force" is a mere irregularity which can be rectified by waiver. Whether or not the term "a nullity" describes the situation with complete accuracy, I am satisfied that, if not served within twelve months, a writ is dead and ineffectual for all purposes. It is true that the court has jurisdiction to infuse

H fresh life into the corpse, but, until that jurisdiction is exercised, what was a writ is no longer a writ and is wholly ineffectual. It is, I think, no more a writ than a document in the form of a writ which could become a writ when properly sealed and issued in the Central Office of the court. The service of such a document could in no circumstances be effective, and it would be idle for a plaintiff to contend that its defect was a mere irregularity because, if it had been taken to the Central Office and the appropriate fee paid, it would, as a matter of right, have been issued as a writ.

On close examination, I do not think that Re Kerley, Son & Verden (1) bears the interpretation for which counsel for the plaintiff contends, nor does it justify the note in the ANNUAL PRACTICE to which I have referred if that note is intended to mean that, without service or authorised acceptance of service by the defendant's solicitor within twelve months, a writ retains efficacy for any purpose unless and until it is renewed by the court. In Kerley's case (1) the writ had, in fact, been served within twelve months, in the sense that the defendant's solicitors, with the defendant's authority, had accepted service and undertaken to enter an appearance. As RIGBY, L.J., pointed out ([1901] 1 Ch. 476), an authorised acceptance of service by the defendant's solicitors waived all obligation as to service on the part of the plaintiff and was equivalent to service on the defendant. In these circumstances RIGBY, L.J., held that Ord. 8, r. 1, had no application. STIRLING, L.J., appears to have considered that this rule had still some relevance, as he was not satisfied that the solicitor's undertaking fell within the provisions of Ord. 9, r. 1. He was, however, careful to confine his decision to the particular facts then before the court, and, at most, that decision means that a writ remains in force after twelve months if within that period the solicitors for the defendant have, with his authority, endorsed on it: "We accept service and will enter an appearance in due course".

Lloyd v. Great Western Dairies Co. (2) is clearly distinguishable from the present case. There is no power in the Act or rules enabling the court or a judge to permit the service of a writ which is no longer in force. Such a power would be something wholly different from the existing jurisdiction to renew a spent writ, in proper circumstances, so as to enable it to be effectually served.

In the result, I am clearly of opinion that the service of this writ on the second defendants was a nullity, and that, in consequence, despite their unconditional appearance, the second defendants are entitled to have it set aside. I need hardly add that I have reached this conclusion with considerable reluctance as it involves the defeat of the plaintiff's major claim on what must seem to her, at least, the merest technicality. Parliament has, however, imposed a time limit for the commencement of proceedings under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and hardship must necessarily arise if, through mistake or any other reason, this limit is exceeded. My duty is to administer the law as I apprehend it, and I am satisfied that the order of the master was correct. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Ship—Repairs—Painting with anti-fouling paint—Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931 (S.R. & O., 1931, No. 133), preamble, reg. 11 (b) (i).

The painting of a ship in dry dock with anti-fouling paint constitutes the "repair" of the ship, and brings the operation within the provisions of the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931, which, according to the preamble, "... apply to the construction and repair of ships in shipbuilding yards", and, therefore, under reg. 11 (b) (i), all staging in the dock for the purpose of the operation must be securely constructed of sound and substantial material and maintained in such condition as to ensure the safety of the persons employed.

ACTION for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff, Victor Frederick Day, who was employed by the defendants as a painter, was engaged in painting a ship with anti-fouling paint in a dry dock.

A staging covered with planks had been erected in order to facilitate the painting, and on Sept. 26, 1951, the plaintiff, while painting, slipped on some of the planks which were oily. He fell to the bottom of the dock, and was injured. It was contended, inter alia, on behalf of the defendants that the painting of a ship with anti-fouling paint did not constitute "repair" of the ship, and, therefore, that there was no breach of statutory duty under the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931, which "apply to the construction and repair of ships in shipbuilding yards."

R. Geraint Rees for the plaintiff.

R. E. Hopkins for the defendants.

PEARSON, J., stated the facts and continued: A question for decision is whether the ship was being "repaired" at the time. Was the work of painting the bottom plates of the ship with anti-fouling paint work of repair within the meaning of the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931? On that question I have been referred to certain decided cases, viz., principally, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Wood v. Walsh & Sons (1); a decision of the House of Lords in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers & Co. (2); the important case of Dredge v. Conway, Jones & Co. (3), a decision of the Court of Appeal; the House of Lords case of London & North-Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (4); and a recent decision of ORMEROD, J., in Taylor v. Ellerman's Wilson Line, Ltd. (5).

In the end, no doubt, the dividing line between work of repair and work of that kind of maintenance which is not repair is not easy to draw, and there is an element of degree in the matter. So far as the authorities are concerned, the Court of Appeal decision in Dredge v. Conway, Jones & Co. (3) that white-washing an internal ceiling constituted repair within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7, is an important authority in favour of giving a wide meaning to "repair" in a somewhat similar case. That decision and its reasoning, in my view, have not been overruled by anything said in London & North-Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (4). I was referred to certain passages in that authority. LORD PORTER said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 267):

"The exact meaning of repair is perhaps not easy to define, but it contains, I think, some suggestion of putting right that which has gone wrong. It does not include the mere keeping in order by oiling, brushing or cleaning something, which is otherwise in perfect repair and only requires attention to prevent the possibility of its going wrong in the future."

LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 270):

"It is probably irrelevant, for I do not understand that any argument was founded on cleaning as distinct from oiling. The work upon which he was engaged was a matter of routine and did not arise out of any defect which he was instructed to put right."

So, very broadly speaking, I think that to repair is to remedy defects, but it can also properly include an element of the "stitch in time which saves nine". Work does not cease to be repair work because it is done to a large extent in anticipation of forthcoming defects or in rectification of merely incipient defects, rather than the rectification of defects which have already become serious. Some element of anticipation is included.

There has not been evidence of an expert character as to what is involved in the operation of applying anti-fouling paint and whether the ship when it first sails the seas has anti-fouling paint on its bottom plates, but one has to draw inferences and take a reasonable common-sense view of the matter. It seems to me that one must suppose that the anti-fouling paint on the bottom plates of the ship is part of the ship: the ship is not complete without its anti-fouling paint. It was explained to me, I have no doubt correctly, that the object of anti-fouling paint is to prevent marine barnacles and other objects from adhering to the bottom of the ship. It must be either that, or it is by way of protection and preservation of the bottom plates. It seems to me reasonable to suppose that a ship is not complete without its anti-fouling paint.

A shipowner finds it necessary or considers it worth while to pay to have the anti-fouling paint on the bottom of his ship renewed, and he presumably does not do that unless there is some reasonable need for it and for the cost to be incurred. I think the proper inference is that the anti-fouling paint has become defective, or has been in process of becoming defective, and the object of the re-painting is to renew the defective or incipiently defective paint. It is different in kind from oiling, brushing and cleaning, and even polishing. The paint is an important part of the ship and this work is the work of rectifying defects or incipient defects. For that reason it is work of repair.

There is also the further argument—whether it is strictly a legitimate argument I am not quite sure—that the work which was being done in this case was the kind of work which needs the protection afforded by the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931. There is no doubt about that on the facts. The staging erected ought to have been made safe, and these were operations which naturally would be done and presumably must be done in dry dock. I think that there is some proper argument to the effect that one ought to have regard to the apparent scope and effect of these regulations in construing the word "repair" for that purpose. I hold that the work here in question is work of repair within the meaning of the regulations, and the decision in Taylor v. Ellerman's Wilson Line, Ltd. (5) can be distinguished on its facts.

I would add that I also considered Potteries Electric Traction Co., Ltd. v. Bailey (6), where a paint shop was held to be devoted to the maintenance of road vehicles, but I did not find anything inconsistent with my present conclusion, and if anything there was a passage ([1931] A.C. 164) which was slightly helpful towards it. But there the word in the relevant statute, the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (2) (b), was "maintenance", the context being "any place used . . . for . . . the . . . maintenance of [the occupier's own] road vehicles . . ." Of course, "maintenance" is a vague word. It is not necessarily distinguished from "repair". It may in some contexts be the same as "repair", and it may in some contexts have a wider meaning which includes repairing as well as other operations. I do not think that the case is of any great assistance. I find, therefore, that there has been a breach of the regulations, and that that breach has caused the accident.

[HIS LORDSHIP then found that the defendants were also in breach of their common law duty in that they failed to take reasonable care to see that the planks used on the staging were not oily or dangerous.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Payment into court—Recovery by legally assisted plaintiff of amount less than that paid in—Liability for defendants' costs after date of payment into court—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 2 (2) (e).

In an action against his employers for negligence and breach of statutory duty by a plaintiff who was an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the defendants paid into court £763. On trial of the action, the plaintiff was awarded £504 ls. 11d. In the civil aid certificate the plaintiff's disposable capital and his contribution towards the costs were assessed at nil. On the question of costs,

HELD: in all the circumstances of the case, including the means of the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute, following the ordinary rule it would be ordered that the plaintiff should recover his costs up to the date of the payment into court and the defendants their costs since that date, and the defendants would be authorised to deduct against the amount of damages awarded to the plaintiff the excess, if any, of their costs since the date of the payment in over the amount of the plaintiff's costs up to that date.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 2 (2) (e), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 535.

APPLICATION as to costs, under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

On June 8, 1953, McNAIR, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, an assisted person under the Act of 1949, for £504 ls. 11d. against the defendants in an action for negligence and breach of statutory duty. HIS LORDSHIP was informed that in May, 1952, the defendants had paid £763 into court. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that by virtue of s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 the ordinary rule in such a case, under which the defendants would set off their costs after payment in against those of the plaintiff up to the date of payment in and deduct any excess in their favour against the amount of the damages awarded to the plaintiff, should not apply.

M. Waters for the plaintiff.

John Thompson for the defendants.

McNAIR, J.: In this case I was informed that there had been a payment into court on May 13, 1952, of £763. Under my judgment I awarded £504 1s. 11d., and if the case had not been a legal aid case I should have thought that this was a proper case in which to apply the normal rule, viz., that the plaintiff would recover costs up to the date of payment in and the defendants their costs since the date of payment in until judgment, and that if on setting off those costs, the one against the other, there was found to be a balance in favour of the defendants, that balance would be deducted from the amount of the damages awarded and only the balance would be paid out to the plaintiff in satisfaction of the judgment. It is argued, however, by counsel for the plaintiff that, as this is a legal aid case, a different order should be made.

The plaintiff at the time of the accident was a boy of sixteen and at the date of the hearing he was aged eighteen and still in the army. From the civil aid certificate it appears that his disposable capital was nil, and his contribution towards his costs was also assessed at nil. In these circumstances it is said that the court ought, under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 2 (2) (e), in considering the plaintiff's liability to bear costs, to make such order as secures that his liability does not exceed the amount, if any, which is a reasonable one for him to pay, having regard to all the circumstances including the means of all the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute. I accept that that is a direction with which the court ought to comply. It is said, too, that there has been no misconduct by the plaintiff in this case and that the only relevant conduct on his part—and I am asked to infer—that on the advice of his legal advisers he did not take out of court this £763 at, or soon after, the date of payment in. It is admitted that, so far as the defendants are concerned, their conduct in the action has been impeccable.

Certain figures were put before me by way of illustration to persuade me to make an order in this case different from that which I would make in the ordinary case. The figures given were these. The plaintiff's costs up to the date of payment in, £20; the defendants' costs after payment in, £130; so that on those figures there would be a balance in respect of costs in the defendants' favour of £110. If that is deducted from the £500 awarded, there will be £390 to go into the legal aid fund. It was further argued that of that £390 which would go into the legal aid fund £170 would be retained by the legal aid authorities to meet the plaintiff's costs, leaving him merely a balance of £220.

I am not concerned at this stage to consider whether the legal aid authorities would be entitled to deduct £170 in a case where the aided litigant's contribution has been assessed at nil. It may be so, but there is, clearly, on the wording of s. 3 of the Act, an argument to be founded to the contrary. If I accede to the plaintiff's submission in this case it would seem to me that I would be depriving the defendants of all the benefit which the rules of court afford to a defendant to pay into court at an early stage in the action, and in that way, in effect, to buy off the litigation. As there is nothing in the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, or the regulations thereunder which deals specifically with the question of payment into court, I must assume that Parliament has not had in mind that in the ordinary case a defendant should, by virtue of the legal aid provisions, be deprived of that right to pay into court with the usual result.

I am fully conscious that the result of making the order which I propose to make at the end of the hearing will be in effect that the plaintiff receives an inadequate sum, or a lesser sum than that which I have considered proper compensation for his injuries, but that result, as it seems to me, follows from the fact that he, either on advice or not—it is immaterial—refused an offer of £760 in May, 1952. In those circumstances it seems to me that if I make the ordinary order which I have indicated, I would not be making the plaintiff liable for any sum which exceeds the amount which it is reasonable for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances including the means of the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute. There will be the ordinary order for taxation of the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client.

Judgment for the plaintiff, with costs up to the date of payment into court, the defendants to have their costs thereafter, the difference between the two amounts to be set off against the damages recovered.

WOODS v. DURABLE SUITES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.JJ., and Harman, J.), June 4, 5, 1953.]

Master and Servant—Duty of master—Provision of safe system of working—Dermatitis contracted through use of synthetic glue—Notice of precautionary measures posted up—Instructions given to workman—Protective cream and washing facilities provided—Workman's failure to take precautions unknown to employer.

To avoid the risk of dermatitis among workmen engaged in spreading synthetic glues in their veneer department, the defendants posted near the place of work a notice specifying the precautions to be taken to avoid dermatitis, instructed workmen in the protective steps required, and made available the necessary barrier cream, soap, and washing facilities. These precautions, if observed, were found as a fact to provide reasonable protection against dermatitis. It was also found that the plaintiff, an experienced workman of fifty-six years of age, was specifically instructed by the manager in the protective measures, but, without the defendants' knowledge, he had not observed them fully, and, as a result, he contracted occupational dermatitis.

HELD: the duty of the defendants was to take reasonable care for the safety of their workmen and not to subject them to any unnecessary risk, but they were under no duty to provide a foreman, constantly watching, to ensure that a workman of age and experience such as the plaintiff took the precautions which he had been instructed to take, and, as they had given the plaintiff proper instructions and provided him with the requisite materials and facilities for his protection, they were not liable for any failure to provide a safe system of working or so to carry on operations as not to subject the plaintiff to unnecessary risk.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of LLOYD-JACOB, J., dated Nov. 20, 1952, in which he gave judgment for the defendants in an action in which the plaintiff claimed damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty. The latter ground of action was not pursued. As regards the allegation of negligence the plaintiff pleaded that the defendants, inter alia, did not exercise any, or any sufficient, supervision over him and his work, and that they adopted an unsafe system of working, in particular, by failing to delegate to a competent person the duty of seeing that the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, were complied with and that sufficient measures were provided for the safety of the plaintiff and were used by him.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants in their veneer department in work which included the application of synthetic glue to pieces of wood which, glued together, had to be passed through rollers. The work involved a danger of the glue getting on the hands of the workman with the attendant risk of dermatitis, and to prevent this risk the plaintiff was provided with a pair of gloves, with his name written in them. The gloves were not convenient for the work, and, to the knowledge of the defendants, their use was impracticable, and the plaintiff and other workmen cut off the fingers to make them more convenient. A circular issued by the Stationery Office in February, 1943 (Form No. 366), was posted close to the place at which the plaintiff worked. The circular specified the practice to be followed to avoid dermatitis when synthetic glues were used. So far as material, it was in the following terms:

"Dermatitis from glues (synthetic). Cautionary notice. N.B. Glue must not be allowed to dry on the skin. Dermatitis is an inflammation of the skin starting with redness and irritation. Some of the ingredients of synthetic (chemical) glues and hardeners may cause dermatitis, but this can generally be avoided by taking the following precautions. Before starting work: (i) After washing, dry the hands and apply the special barrier preparation (skin protective) provided. Re-apply after each washing. At work: (ii) Roll the sleeves down and fasten them at the wrists; the arms are then protected. (iii) Never allow glue (especially if mixed with the hardener) to dry on the skin. Wipe it off at once with the damp swab provided. Wash using the special soap if the amount of glue on the skin is more than a trace."

Barrier cream, soap and washing facilities were provided, and at all material times the plaintiff was made aware of the danger of getting glue on his hands and of the precautionary measures to be adopted, including creaming his hands before commencing work and after every washing, and removing any adherent glue with rags and thereafter washing his hands in hot or warm water every time he was splashed. The plaintiff contracted dermatitis. LLOYD-JACOB, J., found as a fact:

"The precautionary measures prescribed by the employers were, if observed, adequate to provide reasonable protection to their workpeople, and, in particular, this plaintiff", but that the identification of the plaintiff's ailment as occupational dermatitis indicated that the precautionary measures had not been fully observed. The manager of the defendants' veneer department, in which the plaintiff worked, accepted full responsibility for seeing that all the appropriate workpeople were acquainted with the precautions and that adequate supplies of materials were available, and he stated in evidence that he specifically instructed the plaintiff in the protective steps required. So long as the manager's brother was foreman there was a complete watching of the workmen and everything was entirely satisfactory, but there had been a change of foreman shortly before the plaintiff entered on this branch of work and LLOYD-JACOB, J., found that:

“It may well be that the transfer of the foreman brother to another part of the country, by removing the manager’s watchdog, led to a slackening in the standard of care observed by the workpeople.”

A He held, however, that, without the knowledge of the defendants, the plaintiff had not followed the instructions himself and he gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Doughty for the plaintiff.

Stephen Chapman for the defendants.

B SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the plaintiff treated the judge’s finding that the transfer of the foreman to another part of the country might have “led to a slackening in the standard of care observed by the workpeople” as a finding of fact that the defendants ceased to do their duty in encouraging their workmen to follow the precautionary measures. I do not read it as a finding that the employers were in any way negligent. The judge found that the plaintiff had been properly instructed and that while the manager’s brother was the foreman there was a complete watching of the men with everything entirely satisfactory, and I do not think that his further statement ought to be treated as a finding of fact that there was any lack of care on the part of the management of the defendants.

C Counsel for the plaintiff relied here and below on Clifford v. Charles H. Challen & Son, Ltd. (1). That was a case of the same nature as this, but it is of the greatest importance to note that, though the nature of the illness and the nature of the work were the same, the facts were quite different. Counsel claims that it lays down a standard to be adopted in a case of this kind. In other words, he seeks to treat that decision as deciding a question of law rather than as being a decision on the facts of that particular case.

D The duty which employers owe to their workmen is stated by LORD HERSCHELL in Smith v. Baker & Sons (2) in these words ([1891] A.C. 362):

E “It is quite clear that the contract between employer and employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition, and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk.”

F That test has been followed through the years, and the commencement of the first judgment in Clifford v. Charles H. Challen & Son, Ltd. (1), shows that it was in the mind of DENNING, L.J., who gave it. In Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (3) LORD MAUGHAM stated the duty in this way ([1937] 3 All E.R. 645):

G “The third, which is a kind of limitation or explanation of the second, is that, in the case of employments involving risk, that rule applies only when the maxim volenti non fit injuria can fairly be invoked. In such employments, it was held that there was a duty on the employer to take reasonable care, and to use reasonable skill, first, to provide and maintain proper machinery, plant, appliances, and works; secondly, to select properly skilled persons to manage and superintend the business; and, H thirdly, to provide a proper system of working.”

The whole of that passage is governed by the words “to take reasonable care and to use reasonable skill.”

In Clifford v. Charles H. Challen & Son, Ltd. (1) a notice in the form of Form No. 366 was posted in the works, but not near the place where the plaintiff worked. There was no barrier cream available at the place where he worked, though he could get some from the store, which was not very convenient.

The facts as given by DENNING, L.J., were as follows ([1951] 1 All E.R. 74):

"In 1946 the workman went to the employers as a 'trainee'. He went into the radio cabinet shop for about six months, and then, for the remaining three years of his service with them, he was in the piano fitting shop where upright pianos were being fitted together."

In 1949 he suffered from dermatitis, and he brought his action against the employers. He alleged that the employers did not provide a special protective cream, called barrier cream, and that they did not provide in the shop where he worked running water in which he could wash. DENNING, L.J., continued (ibid.):

"It was common knowledge in the works that there was a danger of skin disease from the use of the glue and that it was necessary to take precautions against it. The plaintiff himself knew of this danger and knew the precautions which should be taken. Indeed, in the radio shop where he first worked the government notice was put up, and he himself read it. In that shop barrier cream was provided. Women brought it from the store for the men to use, and there were two buckets of water to wash with. In the piano fitting shop, however, where the workman went after his first six months, the notice was not up, there was no barrier cream, and there was only one bucket of water. The barrier cream was kept in the factory store. The workman and the other men in the piano fitting shop could have got the cream from the store if they had wished, but in that shop none of them used it. A significant phrase was used by the foreman of the shop. When he was asked: 'Was the barrier cream popular?' he said: 'I do not think so. I was not a great believer in it myself.' The foreman said that the one bucket of water in that shop got very dirty and he had to complain about it. He eventually got a second bucket, but the workmen used it for washing rags, and so they reverted to one bucket for washing hands."

On those facts SELLERS, J., decided in favour of the employers. He came to the conclusion that there was no breach by them of their statutory duty, nor was there any breach of their duty at common law. The workman appealed, and this court allowed his appeal. I have read a portion of the facts in order to show the difference between that case and the case now under appeal, and the danger of treating the one as governing the other. DENNING, L.J., said in that case (ibid., 74):

"On those facts, the question is whether the employers fulfilled their duty to the workman. The standard which the law requires is that they should take reasonable care for the safety of their workmen. To discharge that duty properly an employer must make allowances for the imperfections of human nature. When he asks his men to work with dangerous substances, he must provide proper appliances to safeguard them, he must set in force a proper system by which they use the appliances and take the necessary precautions, and he must do his best to see that they adhere to it. He must remember that men doing a routine task are often heedless of their own safety and may become careless about taking precautions. He must, therefore, by his foreman, do his best to keep them up to the mark and not tolerate any slackness. He cannot throw all the blame on them if he has not shown a good example himself."

When an action of this kind is brought the workman is endeavouring to throw the blame on the employers. DENNING, L.J., was dealing with the facts of that particular case. When he used the words:

"He must, therefore, by his foreman, do his best to keep them up to the mark and not tolerate any slackness", it must not be thought that he was saying: "If the foreman, personally, does not do that, the employers are of necessity at fault." In the present case the manager said: "I instructed this man how to do his work and what precautions he should take." The evidence of the manager was accepted by the judge. If the manager instructs the man, there is no need, perchance, for the foreman to instruct him as to the same matter. On the evidence in the present case the plaintiff knew everything that he had to do.

A Counsel for the plaintiff would have this court read the words of DENNING, L.J., as meaning that there must always be a foreman standing over the men, watching to see whether they used the barrier cream or not. I do not think that DENNING, L.J., can have meant that. Early in his judgment he said (ibid., 74):

B "The standard which the law requires is that they should take reasonable care for the safety of their workmen."

Counsel sought to develop an argument of this kind: "The judge said it may well be that some slackness crept in after the change of foreman, and the new foreman was not called. DENNING, L.J., said the employer must, by his foreman, do his best to keep them up to the mark and not tolerate any slackness. On the finding of fact the plaintiff is entitled to succeed." I do not agree. I do not believe it to be part of the common law of England that an employer is bound, through his foreman, to stand over workmen of age and experience, every moment they are working, and every time that they cease work, to see that they do what they are supposed to do. That is not the measure of duty at common law. The employer's duty is, as LORD HERSCHELL said in Smith v. Baker & Sons (2) ([1891] A.C. 362), to take reasonable care and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk.

D Of course, the greater the danger the greater the precautions which are necessary. No one disputes that, but it is not right to seek to read those words of DENNING, L.J., as stating a general duty. He was dealing with the particular facts of that case. He said in his judgment ([1951] 1 All E.R. 75):

E "The foreman did not insist on it—as he said, he was not a great believer in it himself", i.e., the use of the barrier cream. I am satisfied myself, on reading the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal, that it was very largely because of the attitude of the foreman in that case—he did not believe in the use of barrier cream and so did not encourage his men to use it—that this court reversed the judgment of SELLERS, J., on what really was a question of fact.

F ASQUITH, L.J., said (ibid., 75) that he had come to the same conclusion as DENNING, L.J., after similar hesitation. He added (ibid.):

G "On balance, I think that, by a small margin, and subject to contributory negligence on his part, the workman has succeeded in discharging the burden on him of showing that his injury resulted from want of a safe working system on the part of the employers."

COHEN, L.J., said (ibid., 76):

H "Where an employer is making use of a dangerous process, it is not enough for him to have available somewhere in the factory the appliances necessary to minimise the danger. The system of working must be one in which the appliances are available at the place where they are needed, and the man in charge of the work should be responsible for seeing, so far as he can, that the workers make use of the appliances provided."

If there are young people or trainees employed in a factory, obviously the need for watching them is greater than in the case of skilled and experienced men. The plaintiff in the present case was fifty-six years of age at the time. He knew what was required of him. He had been instructed by the manager what he should do. He was one added to a team. There were eight people employed on this class of work, they all knew what they should do, and the plaintiff did not do that which he knew he ought to do. LLOYD-JACOB, J., came to the conclusion that the defendants were not shown to have been at fault. I should have reached the same conclusion on the evidence, though I would not like anything that I say to be read as causing anyone to think that I do not realise the need for the observance of the precautions which are recommended when synthetic glues are used. I agree with LLOYD-JACOB, J., that negligence on the part of the employers was not proved. The fact that the plaintiff succeeded in Clifford's case (1) on appeal, and the judgments which were delivered in that case, may have led some to think that a new standard was laid down by the Court of Appeal. It was not. The old standard remains. It is the duty of the employer to take reasonable care so as not to subject his workmen to unnecessary risk. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. Counsel for the plaintiff addressed two main submissions to the court. In the first place, he said: "Accepting the findings of fact of the learned judge, it should be held that there was a failure properly to supervise". In the second place, he criticised certain findings of the learned judge as not being warranted by the evidence, and, in particular, he submitted that the learned judge was wrong in saying that proper instructions had been given to the plaintiff. I do not find myself able to accept either of these submissions. The learned judge held that the plaintiff was made aware of the danger of getting glue on his hands and of the precautionary measures which the employers required to be observed. He was not satisfied that the supplies of barrier cream were not sufficient. He held that the precautionary measures, if observed, would have been adequate to prevent injury. He further held that when the manager transferred the plaintiff in December, 1950, to the glue-spreading operations, he specifically instructed him in the protective steps that he should take. And, lastly, he held that the defendants were never aware that there was non-observance of the requirements that they had laid down.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence and held that there was ample material to warrant these findings and continued:] The obligation of an employer towards his servants includes an obligation to exercise due care and skill, to provide a proper system of work, and to provide effective supervision. If an employer allows safety precautions to lapse and to fade away into desuetude, it may well be that, on the facts of a particular case, there may be proof that there has been a failure to exercise due care and skill and to provide a proper system of work, but each case must depend on its own exact facts. The duty to exercise due care to provide effective supervision does not involve that an employer must provide a corps of overseers to ensure that some process, in regard to which there has been faithful and ample coaching, is at all times properly carried out. Again, each case must depend on its own facts. If a time comes when there is knowledge of the neglect of, or the rejection of, safety precautions, then, on the facts of the particular case, it may be that it can be established that there has been a failure to take reasonable care to supervise the smooth working of a safe system. On the facts of the present case, in my judgment, the learned judge came to a correct conclusion.

PRACTICE NOTE.

R. v. YINDRICH.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Hallett, Streetfield and Donovan, JJ.), June 16, 1953.]

A Criminal Law—Appeal—Appeal on question of law—Desirability of certificate from trial judge—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 38 (2) (a)—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (c. 23), s. 3 (a).

B Where a convicted person has a right to appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal against his conviction under s. 3 (a) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, without leave on a ground which involves a question of law alone, it is nevertheless desirable that the judge of the court of trial should grant a certificate that it is a fit case for appeal because, by s. 38 (2) (a) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, in the event of the appeal being dismissed, if a certificate has been granted sentence will run from the date of conviction, whereas, if there is no certificate, sentence will not run from conviction unless the court so directs.

C FOR THE CRIMINAL APPEAL ACT, 1907, s. 3 (a) and (b), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 928; and FOR THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, s. 38, see ibid., Vol. 28, p. 378.

APPEAL against conviction.

D The appellant, Winifred Mary Yindrich, was convicted before the chairman at the West Kent Quarter Sessions on May 11, 1953, of embezzlement, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

Sir Frank Soskice, Q.C., and Wigoder for the appellant.

D. A. Hollis for the Crown.

E HALLETT, J., having delivered the judgment of the court allowing the appeal, said: There is one more matter to which I ought to draw attention. The learned chairman intimated that he was prepared to give a certificate that this was a fit case for appeal, but he did not do so as a certificate is not necessary where, as here, the ground of appeal involves a question of law alone. He has reported to this court to the same effect—that he was prepared, if necessary, to grant the certificate. There is a matter of procedure which we think has, perhaps, been overlooked. It is true that under s. 3 (a) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, a person convicted on indictment may appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal against his conviction without a certificate on any ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone, but, none the less, we desire to point out that, if the court of trial thinks that the point indicated is such that it would be right for it to be investigated here, a certificate should be granted although under s. 3 (a) an appeal may be possible without it. The reason is that under s. 38 (2) (a) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, in the event of the appeal being dismissed, if there is no certificate the sentence will only run from the date of conviction if the court so directs, whereas, if a certificate is given by the learned judge, recorder, or chairman, as the case may be, time will run from conviction without the court so directing. Therefore, the existence of a certificate is a very substantial advantage to the appellant as regards the length of sentence which he has to serve.

WARD v. MILLS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 15, 1953.]

Legal Aid—Certificate—Power of court to extend time for issue of full certificate—Assessment of contribution after expiration of emergency certificate—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 10 (9), reg. 12 (1)—R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 7.

Regulation 10 (9) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, provides:

“An emergency certificate shall remain in force for a period of six weeks or such longer period not exceeding three months as the local committee may allow, and unless within that period a certificate is issued in respect of the proceedings to which the emergency certificate relates, it shall at the end of that period, be deemed to have been revoked.” By reg. 12 (1): “Subject to the provisions of this regulation, a person whose certificate is revoked shall be deemed never to have been an assisted person in the proceedings to which the certificate related . . .”

On Dec. 10, 1952, the defendant applied to a local committee for and was granted an emergency certificate to enable him to appear as an “assisted person” under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in an appeal to the Court of Appeal from a decision of a county court. The emergency certificate was extended by the local committee under reg. 10 (9), from six weeks to three months, and, therefore, it expired on Mar. 10, 1953. The National Assistance Board did not estimate the amount of the defendant’s contribution until Mar. 16, i.e., after the period of three months from the issue of the emergency certificate, and, therefore, no full certificate was issued before the expiration of that period. The appeal was heard on Dec. 12, 1952, and it was dismissed on Feb. 6, 1953, no order as to costs being made until it was ascertained whether the defendant was an assisted person. The defendant now contended that in the circumstances reg. 12 (1) did not apply and that in any case the court had power under R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 7, to extend the time during which a valid full certificate could be issued beyond the date of the expiration of the emergency certificate.

HELD: the power under Ord 64, r. 7, was restricted to the enlargement or abridgment of “the time appointed by these rules”, that is, the Rules of the Supreme Court, for the doing of any act or the taking of any proceedings and was inapplicable to an extension of time under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, reg. 10 (9) of which dealt exclusively with the extension of the period of validity of an emergency certificate; under reg. 10 (9) the emergency certificate must be deemed to have been revoked; and under reg. 12 (1) the defendant was to be deemed never to have been an assisted person in the proceedings.

Case referred to:

(1) Greenwood v. Sketcher, [1951] 1 All E.R. 750; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPLICATION as to costs in an appeal by the defendant against an order of His Honour JUDGE GLAZEBROOK made at Southend County Court, dated July 31, 1952.

T. H. K. Berry for the defendant.

Rountree for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This application arises out of a decision of this court in an action brought in Southend County Court. The defendant appealed to this court from the decision of His Honour JUDGE GLAZEBROOK and the matter was heard on Dec. 12, 1952. Judgment was reserved and given on Feb. 6. The case was originally to have come on at the end of October, 1952, but an adjournment was granted on the ground that the defendant was applying for legal aid. He apparently spent some time in seeking assistance from other sources, but he failed to get that assistance, and on Dec. 10 he applied for and was granted an emergency certificate. That emergency certificate was extended under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 10 (9), by the local committee from six weeks to three months, and, therefore, expired on Mar. 10. The order was not drawn up when we delivered our judgment because there was a question concerning costs and whether the unsuccessful appellant was or was not covered by the legal aid scheme. The necessary steps which follow the granting of an emergency certificate were set in motion. The procedure is, stating it very broadly, that the litigant's means are investigated by the National Assistance Board, and if as a result of that investigation it is thought a proper case for legal aid a full certificate is issued which dates back to the time of the granting of the emergency certificate.

In the present case, the National Assistance Board had not estimated the defendant's contribution by Mar. 10, when the emergency certificate expired, and in fact they did not do so until Mar. 16. It is said, and I do not disagree, that that was no fault of the defendant, but I think, in fairness to the National Assistance Board, it is right to bear in mind that the application was not made, as one would normally expect it to be, at the time when the notice of appeal was served, but, indeed, was not made until some time after the case would normally have come on, and only two days before it in fact came on, for hearing. Counsel for the defendant admitted that there were great difficulties in the way of his submission that the defendant was, or, alternatively, ought to be, treated as if he was a legally assisted person in respect of this appeal.

Regulation 10 (9) provides:

The extended period having expired and no other certificate having taken its place, it was deemed to have been revoked on Mar. 10. Regulation 12 (1) provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this regulation, a person whose certificate is revoked shall be deemed never to have been an assisted person in the proceedings to which the certificate related, and a person whose certificate is discharged shall, from the date of discharge, cease to be an assisted person in those proceedings."

The application of that rule to an expired emergency certificate came before this court in Greenwood v. Sketcher (1). It could have been argued that reg. 12 (1) should not be read as necessarily applying to a revocation which was merely deemed to have taken place by expiration of time under reg. 10 (9). That possible construction was rejected by this court in Greenwood v. Sketcher (1). It was held, in effect, that where an emergency certificate expired, as did this one, by effluxion of time, it cannot be put right again ex post facto by the granting of a full certificate at a later date. According to the headnote, it was held ([1951] 1 All E.R. 750):

"a certificate issued in respect of proceedings to which an emergency certificate related to be valid must be issued within the period during which the emergency certificate remained in force, namely, either six weeks or such longer period not exceeding three months as might have been allowed by way of extension under reg. 10 (9); the certificate in the present case had not been issued within a period of three months from the date of the emergency certificate and so was not valid; no valid certificate having been issued, under reg. 10 (9) the emergency certificate must be deemed to have been revoked; and, therefore, the appellants were not 'assisted persons' and were liable to pay the costs of the appeal."

I think that that case covers what happened here.

Counsel for the defendant submits, in the first instance, that this court has power under R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 7, which deals with extensions of time under the Rules of the Supreme Court, to deal with the matter by extending the time during which a valid full certificate could be issued. A notice of motion dealing with the matter is not before us, but the point was left open in Greenwood v. Sketcher (1), and it falls to be dealt with by this court. I am of opinion that Ord. 64, r. 7, is inapplicable. In the first place it is restricted to the doing of any act or the taking of any proceedings within "the time appointed by these rules", i.e., the Rules of the Supreme Court. I would have thought that those words did not include the Legal Aid (General) Regulations. I think also that it is a misconception to regard what is sought as an extension of time, although from one point of view it may be so regarded. Regulation 10 (9) deals with a particular subject-matter which gives the certificate force for a certain period and goes on to say that a certain body—not this court—may extend it for a further period. I think the manner in which this subject is dealt with in this regulation takes it out of any general power which this court has, under Ord. 64, r. 7, to extend the time, or which it may have for certain purposes under its inherent jurisdiction. I, therefore, think that that point fails.

In the second place counsel for the defendant asks us to exercise our discretion so as to deal with the costs in effect in the same way as if the defendant had become a legally assisted person. That, I think, must be wrong. People are either legally aided persons or they are not. If they are, the court in dealing with the costs applies the provisions of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations. If they are not assisted persons, the court must deal with the matter on that basis. Although there is a discretion, it is well known that in the absence of very special circumstances an appellant who has brought an appeal and failed has the ordinary order as to costs made against him. In my opinion, the court has no option in this case but to take that course.

H. E. DANIELS, LTD. v. CARMEL EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), May 20, June 8, 1953.]

Arbitration—Award—Two separate disputes arising out of one contract—Validity of second award.

A By contracts dated Mar. 25 and Mar. 26, 1952, buyers agreed to buy from sellers a quantity of China Star aniseeds. By the rules of the General Produce Brokers' Association, which were incorporated in the contracts, the parties were to submit any disputes which might arise to arbitration and to be bound by any award which the arbitrators might make. In May, 1952, the goods were delivered, the buyers claimed arbitration on the grounds of quality, and arbitrators were appointed who found in their favour. B Later, the buyers having re-sold part of the goods, it was found that they were not China Star aniseeds, but a quality called "religiosum", which contained poison and was worthless. The buyers then claimed a further arbitration on the grounds that the sellers had failed to deliver the contract goods. The sellers contended that there had already been an arbitration on the condition and quality of the goods and that all disputes between C them and the buyers were res judicatae. The buyers appointed an arbitrator, and, on the sellers' refusal to appoint an arbitrator, one was appointed for them under the rules of the association. The arbitrators made an award in favour of the buyers which the sellers refused to recognise. In an action by the buyers to enforce the second award,

D HELD: there was clearly a second dispute which the parties had agreed to submit to arbitration, and, subject to their right to require the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a Special Case, they had agreed to be bound by the award; the sellers had failed to require the arbitrators to state their award in the form of a Special Case on the question whether the contractual provisions for arbitration in the event of a dispute had E been exhausted by the first submission and award; and, therefore, the award in the second arbitration was conclusive against them.

ACTION to enforce arbitrators' award.

G By two contracts, dated Mar. 25 and Mar. 26, 1952, the plaintiffs, H. E. Daniels, Ltd., who were members of the General Produce Brokers' Association of London, agreed to purchase from the defendants, Carmel Exporters and Importers, Ltd., two parcels, each of five tons, of China Star aniseeds, c.i.f. Hong Kong for shipment in April, 1952. The purchases were made through H brokers. The contracts provided that quality should be "about as per sealed sample in selling brokers' possession", and that they should be read and construed as if there were incorporated therein the terms and conditions of the appropriate current form of contract issued by the General Produce Brokers' Association, which was standard form No. 1. This form provided that the contracts should be construed as if there were incorporated in them the rules of conditions of sale of the General Produce Brokers' Association, dated Jan. 29, 1945, and that any dispute arising out of the contracts should be settled by arbitration in London according to the rules of the association. Part II of the rules dealt with arbitration, rr. 40-75 being headed "General" and rr. 76-84 being headed "Quality or condition of goods". Rule 49 (a) was as follows:

"A written contract containing an agreement between parties privileged under these rules to submit any disputes which may arise in the future to arbitration in accordance with the rules of the General Produce Brokers' Association of London shall be deemed to contain an implied agreement by all parties to submit to arbitration in accordance with these rules and an implied undertaking to be bound by and observe the award of the arbitrator, arbitrators or umpire and any interlocutory directions given or order made by him or them."

Rule 76 provided:

"All disputes concerning quality or condition of goods referred to arbitration in accordance with these rules shall be subject to the rules of the association in general and to the following rules in particular, provided always that where on any point there is any inconsistency then the following rules shall prevail."

Rule 80 provided:

"The arbitration shall be conducted solely on the question of quality or condition of goods and if it be found that the sample or samples have not been drawn in conformity with contract requirements or that the particulars of the goods or sample(s) do not agree with those stated in the contract . . . or should matters arise other than those concerning quality or condition, the arbitrator, arbitrators or umpire (as the case may be) shall forthwith return the appointment to the broker and shall not proceed in the arbitration unless and until they are re-appointed to act."

In May, 1952, the sellers delivered the goods to the buyers who accepted and paid for them. On May 13, 1952, the buyers claimed arbitration on the grounds of quality, alleging that the goods were "exhausted seeds and also not equal to selling sample". On May 30, 1952, arbitrators were appointed, and on June 11, 1952, they made an award on each of the contracts that the sellers should pay the buyers an allowance of 8s. 9d. per hundredweight. The buyers in due course re-sold part of the goods, and at the end of July, 1952, one of their buyers pointed out to them that the goods were not China Star aniseeds, but a bastard quality originating in Japan called "religiosum", which contained poison and was worthless. Accordingly, the buyers claimed a further arbitration on the ground that the sellers had failed to deliver contract goods. The sellers refused to admit liability on the ground that the contract had already been arbitrated once and that all disputes between themselves and the buyers were res judicata. On Aug. 22, 1952, the buyers appointed an arbitrator, and on the sellers' refusal to do likewise, the General Produce Brokers' Association appointed one on their behalf under r. 62. On Jan. 22, 1953, the arbitrators issued an award in which they found that the goods delivered did not conform to the contract description and awarded the buyers the whole value of the goods and damages. The sellers refused to recognise this award and moved the court to set it aside on the grounds (i) that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to make it and (ii) that it was bad in law on its face. On Mar. 3, 1953, LORD GODDARD, C.J., refused to set the award aside on the ground that it was bad in law on its face and held that the claim that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to make the award was not one which could be dealt with on motion. The buyers now brought an action to recover the sum awarded them in the second arbitration.

T. G. Roche for the buyers.

Duveen, Q.C., for the sellers.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 8. PILCHER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, and continued: Counsel for the buyers put his case as follows. He submitted that the plea of res judicata is based on the doctrine of estoppel. He contended that the buyers had a separate cause of action at each arbitration, although both causes of action arose out of the same contract. In the quality arbitration their cause of action arose from the failure of the sellers to fulfil their promise or warranty as to the quality and condition of the goods, and in the second arbitration their cause of action arose from the sellers' failure to fulfil the promise or implied condition that the goods would answer the contractual description. The only dispute between the parties at the time of the first arbitration being as to quality, this was the only dispute which could then be submitted to arbitration and be adjudicated on by the arbitrators. Subsequently, so counsel argued, another cause of action, dependent on a different promise not relating to quality, arose. Once again, this was a dispute between the parties which, under the rules, fell to be determined by arbitration differing procedurally from the first quality arbitration. Counsel's second point was as follows. He pointed out that the doctrine of res judicata is a shield, a defence which was open to the sellers at the second arbitration. Although the sellers chose not to appoint an arbitrator or to take any part in the proceedings, the fact that this was their contention was brought to the attention of the arbitrators, who none the less made an award in favour of the buyers without even appointing an umpire. In these circumstances counsel contended that the award so made is conclusive against the sellers. It is, perhaps, worth noting that the concluding sentence of r. 62, which governed the procedure in the second arbitration, is as follows:

"An arbitrator so appointed by the appointment committee shall act in the reference as if he had been appointed by consent."

Counsel submitted that the sellers should, if they wished to take what is essentially a point of law, have taken steps to see that the arbitrators in the second arbitration stated their award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court. They having failed to take this course and allowed a final award to be made against them, the matter was, he submitted, concluded. The parties, he argued, agreed to refer "any dispute arising out of the contract" to arbitration and agreed, by r. 49, "to be bound by and observe the award", subject, of course, to their right to ask for a Special Case or to move to set the award aside. He submitted that the words "any dispute arising out of the contract" included all disputes except a dispute whether the parties had ever been in contractual relationship. For this proposition he cited the well-known case of Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd. (1).

Counsel for the sellers submitted that on the facts of this case the buyers never had more than one cause of action. This was a contract for the sale of goods and the only matters which were ever in dispute concerned the issue whether the sellers had delivered goods of the contract quality and description. He relied strongly on Conquer v. Boot (2), in which the plaintiff brought an action in the county court for breach by the defendant, who was a builder, of his contract to complete a bungalow in a good and workmanlike manner, setting out certain particulars of his claim. He duly succeeded and recovered a sum which was within the county court jurisdiction in respect of his first claim. He then brought another action in the county court claiming in identical terms in respect of the builder's breach of contract for a different amount, and alleging that, in addition to having failed to complete the bungalow a good and workmanlike manner, the defendant had failed to build it with proper materials, and then he gave further particulars which were of the same character as the particulars given in the first action, but related to different complaints that he had in regard to the building of the bungalow. The matter came before the Divisional Court and it was there held that the cause of action was the same in both actions, namely, breach of contract, and that, the question having been decided in the first action, the matter was res judicata, and the plaintiff could not recover further damages. I propose to read a passage from the judgment of TALBOT, J. ([1928] 2 K.B. 343):

"The rule of law on which the defendant relies is thus stated by BOWEN, L.J., in Brunsdon v. Humphrey (3) (14 Q.B.D. 147): 'It is a well settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all', and by LORD HALSBURY in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell (4) (11 App. Cas. 132): 'No one will think of disputing the proposition that for one cause of action you must recover all damages incident to it by law once and for ever': see the form of plea in BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed., p. 624. The defendant contends that there is here but one cause of action—namely, that the defendant having promised properly to complete a bungalow for the plaintiff for a sum of money to be paid on completion, has failed to do what he promised, and that the particulars subjoined in the two actions are merely details of the manner in which he has failed to perform the one contract, and of the damages payable for his breach of it. The plaintiff on the other hand says that the first action was brought for the various breaches of contract specified in the particulars, that each of them is a separate breach of a separate contract and a separate cause of action, and that therefore the former judgment is no answer to the present action. It appears to me that as to this the defendant is right and that the cause of action sued on in the second action is the same as that sued on in the first. It is the same in point of form. The form is substantially that in BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed., p. 271, and the precedents there referred to. It is the same also in substance. The contract is an entire contract. No claim for payment could have been made by the defendant unless and until he had finished the bungalow. There is one contract and one promise to be performed at one time, although no doubt the defendant may have failed to perform it in one or in many respects. There may of course be many promises in one contract, the breach of each of which is a separate cause of action."

Then he continued (ibid., 344):

"Here there is but one promise, to complete the bungalow; and the question whether or not it has been performed is to be decided by the state in which the bungalow was when it was handed over by the defendant to the plaintiff as complete. From that moment the Statute of Limitations began to run as to the whole. The plaintiff could not alter the fact that he was recovering damages for the breach of this single promise by failing to specify in his action all the particulars of the breach and all the damages to which he was entitled. The test whether a previous action is a bar is not whether the damages sought to be recovered are different, but whether the cause of action is the same."

He added (ibid., 345):

"No more can he [the plaintiff] recover in one action for breach of a single promise in ten respects and in another for breach in ten other respects of the same promise. The giving of such particulars as are necessary to enable the defendant to know what case he has to meet is merely incidental to the bringing of the action, and a plaintiff cannot give himself a right to bring an action which otherwise he could not bring by failing to specify all the matters which go to make up his one cause of action, or to claim all the relief to which he is entitled in respect of it."

No doubt, it is possible that a party may have more than one cause of action based on separate breaches by the other party of the same contract. An

A instance of this would be where successive breaches had taken place of a contract performed by instalments. Other instances can be thought of. The submission of counsel for the buyers that the breach of every promise, express or implied, in a contract gives rise to a different cause of action seems to me, however, to be putting the matter too high and to receive no support from the passages which I have just quoted from Conquer v. Boot (2). Having given the matter careful consideration I am quite unable to distinguish the present case on its facts from Conquer v. Boot (2). There the cause of action in each proceeding was based on the defendant's failure to build and hand over to the plaintiff a bungalow constructed in a good and workmanlike manner. Here the buyers' cause of action was in respect of the sellers' failure to make delivery of goods of the quality and description provided for by the contracts. I, accordingly, decide against the buyers on the first point argued by counsel for the buyers. This leaves for consideration the point whether any distinction can properly be drawn between the rule applicable to actions, as stated in Conquer v. Boot (2), and the situation which has arisen in the present case.

B The parties here have agreed to submit their disputes to arbitration under an elaborate set of rules, which, however, were well understood by the commercial gentlemen concerned. The only dispute of which the parties were aware at the time of the first arbitration was a dispute as to quality. In this connection, I draw attention to the words of r. 77:

C "The broker after satisfying himself that the dispute concerns only quality or condition shall . . ."

D I also draw attention to r. 80. It is quite clear that the rules are framed in this fashion in order that the procedure to be followed in quality or condition arbitrations shall be limited to cases in which quality or condition only are in dispute. If the dispute concerns quality or condition and any other dispute as well, for example, as to weight or sufficiency of documents, the general conditions govern procedure unless some special direction is given under r. 80. The effect of the argument of counsel for the sellers on this point leads to the result that, under the arbitration clause commonly incorporated in this well-known standard form of contract, parties who go to arbitration over some trifling difference of view as to quality can wash their hands of the whole matter and defeat, as in this case, a serious claim based on what seems to have been a fundamental misdescription of the goods. It now seems clear that the goods delivered to the buyers were not China Star aniseeds, but were aniseed E "religiosum" and, as such, worthless. It was not suggested in argument before me that either party, or the arbitrators at the first quality arbitration, had been guilty of any negligence or lack of care in not discovering this fact until F it was pointed out to the buyers by their sub-buyers. I assume that the sellers were morally innocent in the matter and that it was their sellers, or more probably the original suppliers, who first misdescribed this toxic product as G China Star aniseeds.

H Proceeding as I do on the assumption that it is impossible to distinguish this case on its facts from Conquer v. Boot (2), by which I am, of course, bound, I have to consider the second submission of counsel for the buyers, which I have already outlined. Here the parties have agreed to submit all disputes arising out of this contract of sale to arbitration. They have chosen their tribunal for better or for worse. They have also agreed to be bound procedurally in regard to the arbitration of any disputes arising by the appropriate rules of the association dealing with arbitrations. At the time of the first quality arbitration there was only one dispute between the parties, namely, as to the quality of the goods. A quality arbitration was, accordingly, held, and the arbitrators dealt with the only matter submitted to them on which there was any dispute, namely, quality. This was, moreover, the only matter with which the arbitrators at this quality arbitration were competent under the rules to deal. Subsequently, a second dispute arises on description. Whether or not technically arising out of the same cause of action, there was clearly a dispute arising out of the contract of sale, and, consequently, a matter which the parties had agreed to submit to arbitration. For such a dispute the rules of the association provide a different procedure. In each case, however, what is in question is a dispute arising out of the contract of sale, and the question I have to consider is whether, when parties have agreed to submit any disputes arising out of a single cause of action to arbitration, the rule in Conquer v. Boot (2) applies—that is to say, whether they must submit all such disputes to one tribunal at one time. It is well known that quality arbitrations, while conducted by highly experienced business men, are often extremely informal affairs, and r. 80 of the rules of the association makes it clear that, if any dispute which does not relate to quality or condition arises at a quality arbitration, the arbitrators are to return their appointments. What then occurs is not made clear by the rule, nor was I informed as to the subsequent procedure in such a case. It may be that separate panels are appointed to deal with the quality dispute and any other dispute which does not concern quality or condition, or it may be that all disputes are then referred to a panel constituted under r. 62. I cannot help feeling, however, that the business community who use the association's rules would be somewhat surprised if they were told that in a case such as this the holding of a quality arbitration exhausted their right to submit any new dispute which might arise to arbitration. Whether this was, or was not, the intention of those responsible for drafting the association's rules when they provided for two different types of arbitrations dealing in water-tight compartments with "condition and quality" disputes and other disputes is, however, immaterial. I have to take the rules as I find them. In principle, there appears to me to be a possible distinction, which may be important on this point, between a judgment and the award of an arbitrator. If I may quote from note (a) at p. 624 of BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS, 3rd ed.:

"A judgment recovered by the plaintiff in an action merges the original cause of action in the higher security and affords a defence to a second action for the same cause."

Where arbitration is in question, the parties agree to submit all their disputes to arbitration, and it is clear that many disputes may arise out of the same cause of action. Whether or not it is proper to regard an award as the same type of higher security as a judgment of the court and as operating as a merger of all the rights of the claimant arising out of the same cause of action may be doubtful. I am inclined, however, to think that, in spite of any technical differences which may exist in this connection between judgments and awards, it might be difficult to argue successfully that, in so far as the point with which I am dealing is concerned, any valid distinction can properly be drawn between them.

For the purpose of this judgment I am prepared to assume that, if the sellers had taken steps to have the award in the second arbitration stated in the form of a Special Case raising the point which they now put forward, they might well have been held entitled to succeed under the decision in Conquer v. Boot (2). I propose, however, to decide this case on broader grounds which I can state quite shortly. The parties have agreed to submit all their disputes to arbitration. The words "any dispute arising out of the contract" cover every dispute except a dispute whether there was ever a contract at all, because, if there was no contract, there was no arbitration clause. In this connection I would quote a passage from the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Heyman v. Darwins, Ltd. (1) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 343):

"If the dispute is as to whether the contract which contains the clause has ever been entered into at all, that issue cannot go to arbitration under A the clause, for the party who denies that he has ever entered into the contract is thereby denying that he has ever joined in the submission. Similarly, if one party to the alleged contract is contending that it is void ab initio (because, for example, the making of such a contract is illegal), the arbitration clause cannot operate, for on this view the clause itself is also void. If, however, the parties are at one in asserting that they entered into a binding contract, but a difference has arisen between them as to whether there has been a breach by one side or the other, or as to whether circumstances have arisen which have discharged one or both parties from further performance, such differences should be regarded as differences which have arisen 'in respect of', or 'with regard to', or 'under' the contract, and an arbitration clause which uses these, or similar, expressions should be construed accordingly."

B In the present case there was clearly a second dispute and an important one arising out of the contract between the parties. Having agreed to submit any dispute to arbitration, the parties were, in my view, bound to submit this dispute to arbitration. The sellers made it clear that they were contending that the contractual provisions for arbitration in the event of dispute had been exhausted by the first submission and award. Whether they were right or not, C there was clearly a point of law which might not be easy for lay arbitrators to determine. Subject to their right to require the arbitrators or umpire to state their award in the form of a Special Case, they had agreed to be bound by, and observe, the award of the arbitrators or umpire: see r. 49 (a). The arbitrators in the second arbitration had, therefore, to consider a question of D fact, namely, whether the goods had been misdescribed, and a question of law, namely, whether they had any jurisdiction to entertain the buyers' claim. The question of law was clearly raised on the correspondence which was before them. They decided both points in favour of the buyers. The sellers had an opportunity of ensuring that the point of law which they were raising should be considered by the court. They failed to take this opportunity and now E find themselves faced with a final award which cannot be impugned on any of the ordinary grounds. Having allowed the matter to proceed in this way, the award of the arbitrators in the second arbitration is, in my view, conclusive against them. There must, therefore, be judgment for the buyers for the sum claimed with costs.

Judgment for the buyers.

In the Estate of PARK. PARK v. PARK.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Karminski, J.), May 14, 15, 18, 19, June 12, 1953.]

Estoppel—Pleadings—Matters pleaded in previous proceedings—Whether confessions of truth of facts stated.

Marriage—Consent—Degree of capacity required.

On Mar. 1, 1948, the deceased executed a will. On May 30, 1949, he married the plaintiff and on the same day he executed a fresh will. He was then an old man, suffering from mental and physical weakness, and on June 17, 1949, he died. On June 23 the plaintiff entered a caveat to the will of May 30, 1949. On July 6 a warning was entered to the caveat, and on July 11 the plaintiff entered an appearance to the warning, describing herself as "the lawful widow and relict" of the deceased. On July 18 the executors of the will of May 30 issued a writ in an action in which they propounded that will, and in that writ the plaintiff was described as "the lawful widow and relict" of the deceased. Subsequently, the present defendant, who was a beneficiary and residuary legatee under both wills, was joined as co-plaintiff with the executors and adopted their pleadings. On Dec. 1, 1950, the will dated May 30, 1949, was pronounced against on the ground that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding at the date of making it. In the present action the plaintiff claimed to have the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, pronounced against on the ground that it was revoked by the marriage on May 30, 1949, and sought a grant of letters of administration as on an intestacy. The defendant alleged that on May 30, 1949, the deceased was incapable of consenting to the marriage and counterclaimed for a declaration that the marriage was null and void, and for a consequent pronouncement in favour of the will dated Mar. 1, 1948. By her reply the plaintiff contended that, as the defendant in the pleadings in the earlier proceedings had alleged that she was the "widow and relict" of the deceased, he was now estopped from disputing the validity of the marriage.

HELD: (i) at no time during the earlier proceedings was the issue of the validity of the marriage before the court, and, therefore, the statements in the pleadings in those proceedings were not to be treated as a confession by the present defendant of the truth of the facts therein stated, and the plea of estoppel failed.

Observations of PARKE, B., in Boileau v. Rutlin (1848) (2 Exch. 680), applied.

(ii) marriage was in its essence a simple contract which any person of either sex of normal intelligence should readily be able to comprehend, and consent to a marriage required a lesser degree of capacity than that required to make a will; the deceased was capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which he was entering, free from the influence of morbid delusions on the subject, and so the marriage was valid and binding; and, therefore, the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, was revoked by the marriage, and the deceased died intestate.

Observations of SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Hunter v. Edney (1885) (10 P.D. 95), applied.

ACTION by the plaintiff claiming that a will dated Mar. 1, 1948, be pronounced against and for a grant of letters of administration of the estate of Robert C John Charles Park, deceased.

- The deceased had for many years been engaged in a business which had in due course become a limited company. In 1939 he withdrew from the day to day work of the company, but retained an active interest in it. In January, 1948, his wife died, and the deceased, then seventy-seven years of age, was greatly upset. On Mar. 1, 1948, he executed a will. In May, 1948, he had a stroke, and on a medical examination it was discovered that he was suffering from hardened arteries, as well as from an enlarged heart and liver and high blood pressure. In August, 1948, he was sufficiently recovered to leave his house and visit the company, but his physical condition was weak and he showed little interest in the details of the business, being sometimes confused and sometimes lucid. The deceased also became forgetful and untidy, and was quite unable to look after his financial affairs. He asked an old friend, a widow, to come to live in his flat in order to look after him and offered to marry her if she would do so, but she declined. In January, 1949, he asked his sister-in-law to come with her husband to live at his flat and to take charge of the household, and they moved in shortly afterwards and stayed until May, 1949. The sister-in-law became so worn out looking after the deceased that she had to consult a doctor. In March, 1949, the deceased became ill, suffering some physical relapse and some degree of mental deterioration. On Easter Monday, 1949, the deceased lunched at his club and afterwards began a conversation with the plaintiff who had been employed for some months as the cashier. On May 7, 1949, the deceased took the plaintiff on a motor drive, and entertained her to lunch. On May 8, 1949, the deceased told his chauffeur-valet that he was going to marry the plaintiff. On May 10, 1949, the deceased took the plaintiff for another drive during the course of which he asked her to marry him. The plaintiff was surprised and said that she would require time to consider the matter. On May 13, 1949, the plaintiff accepted the deceased's proposal and he then gave her a ring. On that or a later day the plaintiff insisted that the marriage should be free from any sexual relationship, and the deceased concurred. On May 14 the deceased gave her £500. On May 16 the deceased told a business colleague of his intended marriage to the plaintiff. On May 18, 1949, there was a meeting at the office of the deceased's solicitor to discuss a proposed ante-nuptial settlement, and the business colleague informed the solicitor of the deceased's financial position. The deceased appeared to take little interest in the discussion. On May 20 the deceased went to stay at a hotel, and during his stay he met his doctor and told him that he was thinking of marrying. The doctor, knowing the deceased's physical and mental condition, advised strongly against marriage, but the deceased was adamant, saying that he wanted companionship and was lonely. On May 26 the deceased returned to his flat, and at about the same time the plaintiff joined him there, occupying a separate bedroom. On May 28 the ante-nuptial settlement was executed whereby the plaintiff was provided with a gross annual income of £300 from preference shares in the deceased's company. On that day the deceased was confused, and had little knowledge of what was taking place. On May 29 the deceased on rising in the morning thought the wedding was due to take place that day. On May 30, 1949, the deceased was married to the plaintiff, the ceremony having been arranged by the plaintiff at a register office. After the ceremony there was a small party at the deceased's flat, during the course of which the deceased retired in order to execute a new will, about which the deceased told the plaintiff nothing. On June 7, 1949, the deceased told his doctor that he was disappointed in the marriage and that it had not been consummated. On June 17, 1949, the deceased died.

The plaintiff entered a caveat to the will dated May 30, 1949, and on July 11, 1950, having been warned, she entered an appearance describing herself as "the lawful widow and relict of the deceased". A writ was issued by the executors propounding that will, and in their pleadings they adopted the same phrase in describing the plaintiff (i.e., the defendant in those proceedings). The deceased's nephew of the half blood (the present defendant) together with his brother, then an infant, on their own application were joined as plaintiffs in those proceedings, they both being beneficiaries under the will and not entitled to a share of the estate on an intestacy, and they adopted the executors' pleadings. That suit was heard by PEARCE, J., and a jury, and on Dec. 1, 1950, the jury found that at the date of the alleged will of May 30, 1949, the deceased was not of sound mind, memory and understanding, and, accordingly, PEARCE, J., pronounced against that will. The plaintiff now claimed as the lawful widow of the deceased to have the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, pronounced against, and claimed a grant of letters of administration of the deceased's estate. The defendant, a beneficiary and a residuary legatee under this will also, by his defence alleged that at the time of the ceremony of marriage on May 30, 1949, the deceased was of unsound mind and mentally incapable of appreciating the nature of the marriage contract and that there was not, and could not have been, any consent by him to that marriage, and by way of counterclaim the defendant claimed a declaration that the alleged marriage between the plaintiff and the deceased was null and void, and that the court should pronounce in solemn form in favour of the will dated Mar. 1, 1948. By her reply the plaintiff denied that the ceremony of marriage was a nullity and asserted that the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, was revoked by her marriage to the deceased on May 30, 1949. Further, the plaintiff contended that the defendant was estopped from alleging that the plaintiff was not the widow of the deceased. The parties cited were the daughters of the deceased's brother who had predeceased the deceased. They were residuary legatees under the will dated Mar. 1, 1948, and were entitled to the whole of the deceased's estate, subject to the life interest of the widow (and her absolute benefits), in the event of an intestacy.

The issue of estoppel was treated as a preliminary point on which KARMINSKI, J., gave judgment on May 19, 1953, as appears below.

Beyfus, Q.C., and Marshall-Reynolds for the plaintiff.

Salmon, Q.C., and John Latey for the defendant.

A. R. Ellis for the parties cited.

KARMINSKI, J.: This is a preliminary point by way of estoppel which has been raised by the plaintiff. She says that in a former action the present defendant sued her as the lawful widow and relict of the deceased. In that former litigation the question in issue was the validity of an alleged will of the deceased dated May 30, 1949, and that will, after a long hearing, was pronounced against on the issue of incapacity. It is said in the present case that that decision was given on the basis maintained by the present defendant and others that she was the lawful widow and relict of the deceased, and she now says that the present defendant is estopped from alleging that she is not the lawful widow and relict of the deceased. I thought it desirable to hear argument on this point before dealing with the facts and merits of the present case. It is fair to counsel for the plaintiff to say that the matter was argued rather on my insistence than on his, and it was not put by him in the forefront of his defence to the allegation in the present suit that the present plaintiff was never in fact or in law lawfully married to the deceased. I am bound to say that I can understand the lack of enthusiasm shown in relying too much on this matter by counsel. I am quite unable at the moment to see how it can be said that the present defendant is estopped. The earlier proceedings were the result of a caveat to the will of May 30, 1949, entered by the present plaintiff. In due course that caveat was warned, and on July 11, 1949, there was an appearance by her to the warning in which she was described by her solicitors, who were the same firm who are acting for her now, as "the lawful widow and relict of the deceased", and one of the persons entitled to share in his estate in the event of an intestacy. The action then proceeded. A writ was issued by the plaintiffs in that action, who were the executors of the pretended will of May 30, 1949, and in their writ they described the present plaintiff as "the lawful widow and relict of the deceased", a description she had given to herself, and which was not then, and was not, indeed, at any time, an issue in that case. Later, by an order of this court, the defendant in the present action and his younger brother, then a minor, were added as plaintiffs and adopted the original plaintiffs' pleadings. It must be emphasised that at no time during the earlier proceedings was the issue of the validity of the pretended marriage between the deceased and the present plaintiff, of May 30, 1949, before the court. It is said by counsel for the plaintiff that it could have been, and ought to have been, raised, but, in my view, it was difficult for anybody to do that in the state of knowledge of the case at the moment it came to trial. It is said, and, no doubt, with force, that matters came to light during the trial of the first case, and to some extent later, which had given ground for the assertion in the present case that there was no marriage.

Authority was cited to me by counsel for the plaintiff in support of his contention, but Woodland v. Woodland (otherwise Belin or Barton) (1), on which he relied, was a decision on very different issues. In that case, there had been already pronounced by this court a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. Subsequently, matters came to light which gave reason for, at any rate, a belief that the wife who had obtained that decree was already married to another person at the time of the ceremony of marriage with the respondent in that case. But it was held by HILL, J., that that could not be re-opened, because, as he put it ([1928] P. 172), a decree of restitution

"is a final decree and it can only be made upon the finding of status—namely, that the husband and wife were and are lawful husband and wife."

HILL, J., then quoted from a well-known passage in STEPHEN'S DIGEST OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE, art. 41 (ibid.):

"'Every judgment is conclusive proof as against parties and privies of facts directly in issue in the case, actually decided by the court and appearing from the judgment itself to be the ground on which it was based: unless evidence was admitted in the action in which the judgment was delivered which is excluded in the action in which that judgment is intended to be proved.'"

I regard that as a classic exposition of the law on the subject, and I think it is quite clear that HILL, J., also so regarded it. There is, it seems to me, a vital difference between the state of affairs where matters have been in issue in previous proceedings and the state of affairs where they might have been. In an often-quoted passage in Boileau v. Rutlin (2), PARKE, B., said (2 Exch. 680):

"It would seem that those [bills of equity], as well as pleadings at common law, are not to be treated as positive allegations of the truth of the facts therein, for all purposes, but only as statements of the case of the party, to be admitted or denied by the opposite side, and if denied to be proved, and ultimately submitted for judicial decision. The facts actually decided by an issue in any suit cannot be again litigated between the same parties, and are evidence between them, and that conclusive, upon a different principle, and for the purpose of terminating litigation; and so are the material facts alleged by one party, which are directly admitted by the opposite party, or indirectly admitted by taking a traverse on some other facts, but only if the traverse is found against the party making it. But the statements of a party in a declaration or plea, though, for the purposes of the cause, he is bound by those that are material, and the evidence must be confined to them upon an issue, ought not, it should seem, to be treated as confessions of the truth of the facts stated."

There, I think, is the vital distinction from the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in the present case, and I am bound to hold that this defence of estoppel fails.

HIS LORDSHIP then heard counsel and evidence on the issue whether or not, on May 30, 1949, the plaintiff and the deceased were lawfully married.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 12. KARMINSKI, J., read the following judgment. The issue before me now, is this: Were the plaintiff and the deceased lawfully married on May 30, 1949? As to the form of the ceremony, there is not and never has been any dispute. What is in issue is the consent of the deceased to that marriage and whether he had the capacity to consent to that marriage at that time. On that issue it was at once accepted by counsel for the defendant that the burden lay on him to prove that a marriage regular in form was in fact invalid through the incapacity of the deceased to consent to it. Assuming that burden of proof, counsel opened the case for the defendant and called his witnesses first. Before dealing with the evidence it is desirable that I should deal first with the principle which insists that consent is an essential ingredient of a valid marriage. This principle is one of great antiquity and, indeed, derives from the Roman law where it was stated in the form nuptias consensus non concubitus facit. This principle was in turn embodied into the canon law of Rome: see ESMEIN, LE MARIAGE EN DROIT CANONIQUE, 1891, vol. 1, p. 97. The principle was adopted into the English canon law. AYLIFFE in his PARERGON JURIS CANONICI ANGLICANI states (p. 362):

"the principal thing required to a legal marriage, is the consent of the parties contracting; which is sufficient alone to establish such a marriage."

In Turner v. Meyers (3) SIR WILLIAM SCOTT spoke of consent in marriage in the following terms (1 Hag. Con. 417):

"In more modern times it has been considered, in its proper light, as a civil contract, as well as a religious vow, and, like all civil contracts, will be invalidated by want of consent of capable persons."

SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Portsmouth (Countess) v. Portsmouth (Earl) (4) stated the law as follows (1 Hag. Ecc. 359):

"When a fact of marriage has been regularly solemnised, the presumption is in its favour; but then it must be solemnised between parties competent to contract—capable of entering into that most important engagement, the very essence of which is consent: and without soundness of mind there can be no legal consent—none binding in law: insanity vitiates all acts.”

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the capacity required to make a will was of a higher degree than that required to contract a marriage, and he relied on the direction to the jury given by SIR JAMES HANNEN in Boughton v. Knight (5) (L.R. 3 P. & D. 72):

“ . . . whatever degree of mental soundness is required for any one of these things,—responsibility for crime, capacity to marry, capacity to contract, capacity to give evidence as a witness,—I must tell you, without fear of contradiction, that the highest degree of all, if degrees there be, is required in order to constitute capacity to make a testamentary disposition. And you will easily see why. Because it involves a larger and wider survey of facts and things than any one of those matters to which I have drawn your attention.”

SIR JAMES HANNEN expanded and explained this passage in Burdett v. Thompson (6), when he said (ibid., 73 n.) speaking of the making of a will:

“ From the character of the act it requires the consideration of a larger variety of circumstances than is required in other acts, for it involves reflection upon the claims of the several persons who, by nature, or through other circumstances, may be supposed to have claims on the testator’s bounty, and the power of considering these several claims, and of determining in what proportions the property shall be divided amongst the claimants; and, therefore, whatever degrees there may be of soundness of mind, the highest degree must be required for making a will.”

I think there is force in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, and I approach the facts of this case on the basis that a lesser degree of capacity is required to consent to a marriage than in the making of a will. In this case, the distinction is of importance since the court has pronounced against the will of May 30, 1949, on the ground of the incapacity of the deceased. And May 30, 1949, is the date of the ceremony of marriage the validity of which is in dispute.

I now have to consider what degree of capacity is required to consent to a marriage, and, further, I must inquire into the meaning of consent in relation to the marriage contract. Marriage has been described as a contract and as the most important contract of life, the very essence of which is consent: see Browning v. Reane (7) where SIR JOHN NICHOLL stated (2 Phillim. 70):

“ It is not material whether the want of consent arises from ideotcy or lunacy, or from both combined: nor does it seem necessary, in this case, to enter into any disquisition of what is ideotcy, and what is lunacy; complete ideotcy, total fatuity from the birth, rarely occurs; a much more common case is, mental weakness and imbecillity, increased as a person grows up and advances in age, from various supervening causes, so as to produce unsoundness of mind. Objects of this sort have occurred to the observation of most people. If the incapacity be such, arising from either, or both causes, that the party is incapable of understanding the nature of the contract itself, and incapable, from mental imbecillity, to take care of his or her own person and property, such an individual cannot dispose of her person and property by the matrimonial contract, any more than by any other contract.”

SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Durham v. Durham (8) (10 P.D. 82) said:

“ . . . the contract of marriage is a very simple one, which does not require a high degree of intelligence to comprehend. It is an engagement between a man and woman to live together, and love one another as husband and wife, to the exclusion of all others. This is expanded in the promises of the marriage ceremony by words having reference to the natural relations which spring from that engagement, such as protection on the part of the man, and submission on the part of the woman. I agree with the Solicitor General, that a mere comprehension of the words of the promises exchanged is not sufficient. The mind of one of the parties may be capable of understanding the language used, but may yet be affected by such delusions, or other symptoms of insanity, as may satisfy the tribunal that there was not a real appreciation of the engagement apparently entered into."

In that case, the ceremony of marriage was performed in October, 1882. There was evidence of symptoms of insanity from and after April, 1883, and it was admitted on behalf of the wife that at the time of the hearing of the suit in March, 1885, she was hopelessly insane. A strong body of evidence including that of two archbishops (one her grandfather) was called to show that the wife was of apparently sound mind in the period immediately preceding the ceremony of marriage, though she was described as being a lady of no great intellectual powers and exceptionally shy and reserved in her manner. In the result, SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., found on the facts that at the time of the marriage ceremony she was capable of, and did in fact, give her consent to the marriage, and he dismissed the husband's petition. In Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (8), SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., had to consider a similar problem, but on very different facts. He posed the question for determination in the following terms (ibid., 95):

"The question which I have to determine is not whether she was aware that she was going through the ceremony of marriage, but whether she was capable of understanding the nature of the contract she was entering into, free from the influence of morbid delusions upon the subject."

It must be borne in mind, as SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., reminded himself in Durham v. Durham (8), that a mere comprehension of the words of the promises exchanged is not sufficient. The minds of the parties must also be capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which they are entering. The precise nature of that contract may vary with the religious beliefs which the parties practise or profess. Some people may regard marriage as a sacrament; others, while still regarding marriage as a sacred and solemn obligation, do not believe in its sacramental nature. But, as SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., pointed out, the essence of the contract is an engagement between a man and a woman to live together and to love one another as husband and wife to the exclusion of all others. It may be, in the present times, that submission on the part of the woman is no longer, as it was in 1885, an essential part of the contract, but so far as the husband is concerned there remains the duty to maintain her, which is, I think, implicit in what SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., described as the duty to protect. In recent times WILLMER, J., in In the Estate of Spier (9), G stated the proposition in these terms ([1947] W.N. 46):

"There must be a capacity to understand the nature of the contract and the duties and responsibilities which it created, and . . . there must also be a capacity to take care of his or her own person and property."

I was told that this decision was subsequently reversed by the Court of Appeal on the facts, but that the statement of the law made by WILLMER, J., was not criticised. The decision of the Court of Appeal is not reported. It is clear, then, that marriage is in its essence a simple contract which any person of either sex of normal intelligence should readily be able to comprehend. I ask myself the question asked in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (8), by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P.: Was the deceased capable of understanding the nature of the contract he was entering into?

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, considered the evidence and continued:] It is clear that at times in the weeks immediately preceding the ceremony of marriage the deceased was confused in that he considered himself already married to the plaintiff. On the other hand, it is equally clear that he pursued his courtship of the plaintiff with persistence and, indeed, with some degree of craft. He was obviously proud of his achievement in winning the plaintiff's consent to his proposal of marriage. In this he was, I think, actuated first and foremost by his desire to escape from the loneliness which had afflicted him since the death of his wife. His determination to go through with the marriage was made clear by him to those around him, especially to his chauffeur-valet and to his doctor who had opposed it. In the course of his argument counsel for the defendant accepted that no high intellectual standard was required in consenting to a marriage; he further accepted that the burden was on him to prove the invalidity of a marriage in form properly celebrated. If he has failed to discharge that burden of proof, then the plaintiff must succeed, but I prefer in this case to answer the question posed to himself by SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., in Hunter v. Edney (otherwise Hunter) (8): Was the deceased capable of understanding the nature of the contract he was entering into, free from the influence of morbid delusions on the subject? It is not an easy question in this case to answer. I have had to consider carefully the manifest mental weaknesses and confusions of the deceased, on the one hand, and his pertinacity and determination with regard to the marriage, on the other. I have come to the conclusion that he could and did understand the nature of the contract he was entering into, and I find that the ceremony of marriage in fact performed on May 30, 1949, between the deceased and the plaintiff constituted a valid and binding marriage between them. In the result, it must follow that the will of Mar. 1, 1948, was revoked by the marriage between the deceased and the plaintiff, and I pronounce against that will and find that the deceased died intestate. I order that all parties' costs as between solicitor and client come out of the estate.

Order accordingly.

STOTT v. SIR WILLIAM ARROL & CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), May 20, 21, 1953.]

Negligence—Personal injuries—Measure of damages—Loss of earnings—Deduction of industrial injury benefits—Benefits accruing after end of period of incapacity—Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948 (c. 41), s. 2 (1).

In an action for damages for personal injuries the plaintiff claimed special damages for the loss of five weeks' earnings while he was incapacitated from work which amounted (after deduction, under the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, s. 2 (1), of half the industrial injury benefits which he received during that period) to £41 6s. 9d. On returning to work the plaintiff received further sums amounting to £126 13s. in the nature of industrial injury or disablement benefit.

HELD: the provision in s. 2 (1) that one half of the rights accruing to the plaintiff in respect of industrial injury or disablement benefit should be taken into account in assessing damages against any loss of earnings was not confined to rights accruing during the period of the plaintiff's incapacity, and, therefore, one half of the £126 13s., viz., £63 6s. 6d., would be taken into account to extinguish the plaintiff's net claim of £41 6s. 9d. for loss of earnings.

FOR THE LAW REFORM (PERSONAL INJURIES) ACT, 1948, s. 2 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, p. 365.

ACTION for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants as a steel erector, had his leg crushed by some steel bars when a stack of them was knocked over by a crane. He was incapacitated from work for five weeks and suffered a loss of wages amounting to £47 15s. 6d. During that period he received industrial injury benefits amounting to £12 17s. 6d. On his return to work he received, in addition, three sums amounting in all to £126 13s., which were admitted to be in respect of industrial injury or disablement benefits. HIS LORDSHIP found the defendants liable and awarded the plaintiff £450 general damages.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that s. 2 (1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948 (which provides that, in assessing damages in an action for personal injuries, one half of the value of rights that have accrued or probably will accrue to the plaintiff in respect of industrial injury benefit, disablement benefit, or sickness benefit must be taken into account against any loss of earnings or profits resulting from the injuries) must be confined to the value of rights accruing during the period of incapacity. On behalf of the defendants it was contended that half of all the amounts received by the plaintiff by way of industrial injury benefit during or after incapacity should be taken into account to the extent of extinguishing the claim for loss of wages.

F. Donald McIntyre for the plaintiff.

Caulfield for the defendants.

SLADE, J.: It is agreed that the plaintiff was incapacitated from his work by this accident for a period which resulted in the loss to him of £47 15s. 6d., that between Nov. 15, 1949, and the day when he returned to work, Dec. 22, 1949, he received benefit at the rate of £2 11s. 6d. a week, amounting in the aggregate to £12 17s. 6d., and that half that sum is deductible from the £47 15s. 6d., that is to say, £6 8s. 9d. In addition to that the plaintiff received three further sums in respect of industrial injury benefit amounting to £126 13s., half of which is £63 6s. 6d. Counsel for the defendants contends that this £63 6s. 6d. can be applied to extinguish the balance of the £47 15s. 6d., that is, the £41 6s. 9d. He says that he is entitled to that on the true construction of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948, s. 2 (1) which provides:

"In an action for damages for personal injuries . . . there shall in assessing those damages be taken into account, against any loss of earnings or profits which has accrued or probably will accrue to the injured person from the injuries, one half of the value of any rights which have accrued or probably will accrue to him therefrom in respect of industrial injury benefit . . ."

A It is agreed that these sums amounting to £126 13s. are industrial injury benefits, that they have accrued to the plaintiff, and that one half of them amounts to £63 6s. 6d. Translating that, therefore, into the figures of this action and leaving out probabilities which do not arise, because everything is known now having regard to the time which the action has taken to reach trial, B I read that section to say that, in assessing the damages, there shall be taken into account against the loss of £47 15s. 6d. one half of the value of any rights which have accrued to the plaintiff in respect of industrial injury benefit, that is to say, one half of a sum which we know amounts in all to £139 10s. 6d. Therefore, it seems at first sight clear that the argument of counsel for the C defendants is correct. It might be said at first sight that he is even entitled to have the whole sum taken into account as against the general damages, but he does not claim that because the excess might be said not to be taken into account against the loss of earnings. He does, however, claim that he is entitled to have half of the sum taken into account to the extent of extinguishing the claim for loss of earnings. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, contends (i) that the words are, "take into account", not "deduct the half", and so one is bound, not to D deduct a half, but merely to take into account a half, and (ii) that, in any event, the sub-section only refers to the taking into account of benefits which have accrued during the period of the incapacity, in this case during the five weeks that it took for the plaintiff to lose his £47 15s. 6d. in wages.

To give effect to the second contention of counsel for the plaintiff seems to E me to involve reading into the section some words of this kind: In an action for damages for personal injuries there shall in assessing the damages be taken into account, against loss of earnings, half of the value of any rights which have accrued or will probably accrue during the period of the incapacity, or during the period that the losses were sustained. I am unable to read any such words into the statute. The statute makes perfect sense as it is, and I decline F to read any such limiting words into it. What do the words "take into account" mean? Why does not the section say, "deduct half the gains from the whole of the losses"? The answer may very well be, in accordance with the argument of counsel for the defendants, that, as half the gains may exceed the losses, and if you deduct 2x from 1x that gives you a minus quantity, the words "take into account" are more appropriate than "deduct". Be that G as it may, whether that is what they mean or whether "take into account" means that, having quantified the gains, divided them by two, and arrived at a figure, one is not to deduct that figure where it is less than the amount of the losses but are merely to take it into account, which may mean deduct that figure or some less portion of the figure, I do not propose to express any opinion on that, because, whichever is the true construction, if it is a matter H of discretion, I think it perfectly right to deduct so much of the one half of the £126 13s. as is necessary to extinguish the remaining £41 6s. 9d., and I so order. The special damages are, accordingly, nil, and there will be judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £450 general damages.

Judgment for plaintiff.

BUTLER v. HUDSON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.),
June 8, 9, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—Sole claimant—Application for declaration under Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g)—Application by landlord to vary order of registrar—Admission of fresh evidence—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920 (S.R. & O., 1920, No. 1261), r. 1 (d), r. 7 (b), r. 19.

County Court—Declaratory judgment—Application for declaration under Rent Restrictions Acts—Remission to registrar—Reference to expert witness—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 90 (1)—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 17 (2).

In 1908 the applicant's father or mother became the contractual tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and from that time until the father's death in 1936 the applicant lived there together with them. In 1932 a rent book was issued for the first time, but it was not clear whether "Mr." or "Mrs." preceded the surname of the tenant on the face of the book. Before 1936 the tenancy had become a statutory tenancy. After the father's death the mother continued to occupy the house with the applicant. After the mother's death in 1950 the applicant commenced proceedings in the county court, by way of an originating application purporting to be under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, r. 1 (d) and r. 19, for a declaration that she had succeeded to the statutory tenancy of the premises on the death of her mother. The application was resisted by the landlord on the ground that the applicant's father and not her mother had been the original tenant. The application was referred to the registrar, who made a declaration in favour of the applicant. The landlord having applied to the judge to vary or rescind the order of the registrar, the applicant wished to call further evidence, but the judge treated the landlord's application as an appeal, to be dealt with on the notes of the evidence taken before the registrar, and refused to admit new evidence. Purporting to act under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 90 (1) (d), the judge referred to a handwriting expert the question whether, in his opinion as a handwriting expert, "Mr." or "Mrs." was written on the rent book. The expert's report being in favour of the landlord, the county court judge reversed the order of the registrar. On an appeal by the applicant, HELD: an application under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), by a member of the tenant's family on the death of a tenant was an application for the purpose of determining, where there had been failure to reach agreement, which member of the tenant's family residing with him was to be entitled to the benefit of the Act; there being no competing claims between members of the deceased tenant's family and the applicant being the only possible tenant, her application was not "under the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act", within the meaning of r. 19 of the rules of 1920, and was not an application under r. 1 (d) and r. 19; and, therefore, the proceedings were wholly ineffective, being without jurisdiction.

Per curiam: Assuming that s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 gave to the county court power to make a declaratory judgment in any case, even though the declaration sought was not ancillary to any other claim, and that the application was made under that sub-section, the only way (other than under r. 19 of the rules of 1920) in which the matter could be referred to the registrar was under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 90 (1), but the judge's direction to the registrar to hear and decide the case was not a reference to the registrar for an inquiry and a report under any of the provisions of s. 90 (1), and, therefore, the decision of the registrar and the subsequent proceedings were, in any event, without jurisdiction and a nullity.

A On an application under r. 7 (b) and r. 19 of the rules of 1920 to vary the decision of the registrar, the judge was acting, not strictly in an appellate capacity, but as a judge of first instance, and it was his duty, particularly when the sole question before him was one of fact, to hear such fresh evidence, relevant to the question at issue, as either party might desire to bring before him.

B According to its terms, the reference to the handwriting expert merely put him in the position of an expert witness giving evidence in the case, and was not a reference to a referee for inquiry and report under any of the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 90 (1).

E APPEAL by the applicant, Miss Dorothy Butler, from an order of His Honour JUDGE HODGSON, made at Wandsworth County Court on Mar. 16, 1953.

In 1908 a house known as No. 117, Gatton Road, Tooting, was built by one Mr. Earland, who then granted a tenancy of it either to the applicant's father, Mr. Butler, or to her mother, Mrs. Butler, and Mr. and Mrs. Butler together occupied it with their two daughters (the applicant and another daughter who later left the house on her marriage to Mr. Earland's son).

F Until 1932 no rent book was issued, and, apparently, the contract of tenancy was not evidenced in writing. In 1932 Mr. Hudson, who had acquired Mr. Earland's interest in the house, issued a rent book, but it was not clear whether he wrote on it "Mr. H. Butler" or "Mrs. H. Butler". In 1936 Mr. Butler died.

Before his death there had been increases in the rent of the house, and, therefore, if he were the original tenant, he was a statutory tenant at the time of

G his death. After his death Mrs. Butler continued to occupy the house until her death on Aug. 22, 1950, and the applicant resided with her. After Mrs. Butler's death the present landlord, Miss Vere Hudson, expressed the intention of selling the house, and the applicant thereupon commenced proceedings in the county court by way of originating application for a declaration that she

H had succeeded to the statutory tenancy on the death of her mother. The landlord was the respondent to the application and the sole issue between the parties was whether Mr. Butler or Mrs. Butler had been the original tenant.

The application, which purported to be under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, r. 1 (d) and r. 19, was remitted to the registrar, who made a declaration that the applicant was the statutory tenant of the premises. The landlord applied to the county court judge to vary or rescind the order of the registrar, and, on Mar. 16, 1953, the judge made an order rescinding the order made by the registrar. From this order of the judge the applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Rountree for the applicant.

Bassett, Q.C., and H. P. B. Dow for the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is a most unfortunate case. Indeed, it may, I think, be described as a chapter of misadventures. The application was by way of originating application entitled: "In the matter of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts, 1920 to 1939", and "In the matter of No. 117 Gatton Road, Tooting", the applicant being Miss Dorothy Butler, of that address, and the respondent Miss Vere Hudson (referred to hereinafter as "the landlord"). By the application the applicant asked (a) for a declaration that on the death of her mother, Elizabeth Susan Butler, on Aug. 22, 1950, she succeeded to the statutory tenancy of the premises, and (b) for costs. It is plain that the application purported to be an application under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, r. 1 and r. 19. At the very first step, therefore, in my judgment, the applicant made a serious mistake, for, in my view, the application which she made was not one which it was competent for her to make under those rules. That, however, is a matter to which I shall return. The landlord has never disputed that the application fell within the rules. The question raised by the application was remitted to the decision of the registrar. It was suggested by counsel for the applicant that that order may have been made by the registrar himself, but counsel for the landlord tells us that the judge did, in fact, make it, though no written order or direction to that effect was given. Such a remission was only competent if the application was within the ambit of the rules. The matter being remitted, the registrar heard certain witnesses and came to a conclusion which he expressed, without following the form of the prayer in the application, as follows: "Declaration that the applicant is the statutory tenant of No. 117 Gatton Road, Tooting". The landlord, being dissatisfied with that decision, proceeded to avail herself (still acting on the supposition that the matter was properly within r. 1 and r. 19) of the power given by r. 7 and r. 19 to apply to the judge to vary the registrar's decision.

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, r. 19, is:

"Where, on the death of a tenant intestate, a member of his family requires the decision of the court under the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g) of [the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920], the judge shall give such directions as to the procedure to be followed, and the notices to be given to and the attendance of all such persons as may be interested as he shall think fit, and he (or the registrar, if so directed by him) shall consider what may be urged (either orally or in writing) by or on behalf of such persons, and thereupon give his decision: provided that the registrar's decision may be varied by the judge pursuant to r. 7."

Rule 7 provides:

"Any application under these rules may be made to the registrar, subject to the following provisions . . . (b) The judge may vary or rescind any determination or order made by the registrar, and may make such determination or order as may be just: (c) An application for such variation or rescission shall be made on notice in writing in accordance with the county court rules as to interlocutory applications . . ."

I have read r. 7 and r. 19 at this stage to draw attention to the following matters: (i) from the language of r. 19 it appears that on an application within it, i.e., an application under the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, the form of procedure to be followed is not thereupon laid down, but is to be directed by the judge; (ii) the judge may direct the registrar to consider the matter and give his decision; and (iii) in the event of the judge so directing, the registrar's decision may be "varied" by the judge pursuant to r. 7. By r. 7 (b), which is not exclusively applicable to r. 19, the judge may "vary or rescind" a determination by the registrar. It may, perhaps, be a matter of inelegant drafting, but it is to be noticed that, according to r. 19, the judge has power to vary but not to rescind the order of the registrar made under r. 7.

- A Counsel for the landlord suggested that in r. 19 variation should be treated as including variation of so far-reaching a character as to amount to rescission. I am not satisfied that that is right. Indeed, I think that the language of r. 19, speaking only of variation, lends some support to the view which I have taken that this case is not within r. 19 at all. However that may be, it is to be noted (and this is one of the items in the chapter of misadventures) that what the judge proceeded to do was not to vary but to rescind the registrar's order.

B The form, however, of the landlord's application to the judge has also given rise to some difficulty. It reads:

"Take notice that the respondent intends to appeal to His Honour the judge for an order varying or rescinding the order made by the registrar."

- C The significance of the fact that, by the form of the notice, the landlord intended to appeal is this. When that application came on before the learned judge, Miss Butler, the original applicant, asked for a direction about calling further evidence. That matter was debated at some length on Dec. 11, 1950, and the judge has made a note, which is a kind of interlocutory judgment, in which he deals with his powers and duties as regards fresh evidence when a case originating under r. 19 finds its way back to him on an application to vary under the same rule. As the judge gave careful consideration to the matter, and as he indicated, on a later date, that he would be glad to have the guidance of this court on the point, it may be convenient for me to say a few words on it, although, in the events which I have already indicated, it does not strictly arise in the present case. In his note, the learned judge, influenced, it may well be, by the form of the landlord's notice, said:

- E "A party must put forward his whole case at once. He must not add to it to meet objections arising on the way, or present his case piecemeal. There must be some finality. I find no such provisions [as those in R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4] in the County Court Rules, but s. 100 of the County Courts Act, 1934, authorises the adoption and application of the Rules of the Supreme Court in all cases where there is not special provision in the county court rules. Accordingly, I propose to follow the usual procedure. I shall hear and consider the evidence already given orally before the registrar as set out in his careful note, and I shall then come to my own decision thereon after hearing the submissions of the parties. I shall not consider myself bound by the findings of fact of the registrar. But, except for very good and sufficient cause, I shall not receive any further evidence."

- H The learned judge was of opinion that, when an application was made under r. 19 to vary a decision by the registrar, it was, in effect, an appeal, and the question what evidence he should receive, other than the evidence recorded by the registrar, was to be decided on the same principles as those on which this court decides whether or not to admit fresh evidence on the hearing of an appeal. In my judgment, that is not a correct view. It seems to me that, although the application is to vary the registrar's decision, the judge is, nevertheless, acting as a judge of first instance. I think, therefore—and particularly is this so when the sole question before him is one of fact—that the duty of the judge is (subject to the limits imposed by a proper exercise of judicial discretion) to hear such evidence as either party may desire to lead before him. He may not feel bound to hear, at first hand, the whole of the evidence that has been given before the registrar—though, again, if the question is whether the registrar has reached a correct conclusion on a matter of fact, prima facie the judge would not interfere with that conclusion unless he heard the witnesses himself—but I think, as I have already said, that, since the judge is dealing with the matter as a court of first instance, he should hear such fresh evidence, relevant to the question at issue, as either party may desire to bring before him. We were referred to British & Argentine Meat Co., Ltd. v. Randall (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal, and Gregson v. Prior (2), which was cited to the learned judge. Neither of those cases directly covers the question with which I am now dealing in the present case, but I think, as a matter of principle, that they lend support to the view which I take and which I have already expressed, namely, that on an application under r. 7 (b) and r. 19 to vary a registrar's decision, the judge is not acting strictly in an appellate capacity but is acting as a judge of first instance. I have thought it right to express my views on this matter because of the care taken by the county court judge and his expressed desire for guidance. I hope, therefore, that what I have said may be of assistance in similar cases. A

On Jan. 8, 1951, when the case came again before the county court judge, counsel for the landlord suggested that Mr. Gurrin, the handwriting expert, should be invited to assist the court, since, in the opinion of the registrar, much turned on the question whether "Mrs." or "Mr." had been written on a rent book in 1932. There was some discussion about the propriety of having any further evidence, particularly in view of what the judge had said on Dec. 11, 1950, but, on counsel for the landlord stating that the landlord would, in any case, pay Mr. Gurrin's expenses, the applicant's solicitor agreed to the suggestion. The form of order which the judge made was as follows: B

"Refer to Mr. Gurrin under s. 90 [of the County Courts, Act, 1934] for inquiry and report on three documents [viz., illustrations of handwriting] whether, in the opinion of Mr. Gurrin as a handwriting expert, the said Mr. Hudson [the landlord in 1932] wrote 'Mr. H. Butler' or 'Mrs. H. Butler' on the face of the rent book." C

In my judgment, here was another misadventure, for that form of reference was not within the ambit of s. 90 of the Act of 1934. Section 90 (1) provides: D

"Subject to county court rules, the judge may refer to the registrar or a referee for inquiry and report—(a) any proceedings which require any prolonged examination of documents or any scientific or local investigation which cannot, in the opinion of the judge, conveniently be made before him; (b) any proceedings where the question in dispute consists wholly or in part of matters of account; (c) with the consent of the parties, any other proceedings; (d) subject to any right to have particular cases tried with a jury, any question arising in any proceedings." E

It is said that the reference to Mr. Gurrin was under s. 90 (1) (d), as being a question arising in the existing proceedings, namely, the question whether Mr. Hudson had written "Mr." or "Mrs." Butler on the rent book, but, unfortunately, the reference was not, according to its terms, to a referee for inquiry and report. It was a reference to Mr. Gurrin whether in his opinion as a handwriting expert the vital word was "Mr." or "Mrs." That was, therefore, an invitation by the judge to an expert witness to give him a piece of evidence. I have not mentioned this matter with any wish to criticise the county court judge, as I think that in this instance what he did was plainly done with the concurrence of the parties. In any case, it seems clear that at some stage an offer was made by the landlord to produce Mr. Gurrin in the county court so that the applicant could cross-examine him, and that offer was not accepted. It was said on the applicant's behalf that, as there had been a reference under s. 90 (1) of the Act of 1934, it did not seem useful, F G H or even, perhaps, appropriate, to suggest cross-examination, all of which goes to show that it is highly desirable to adhere properly to the words of the Acts and the rules which are being invoked. I think that the consent of the parties to what was done explains the technical error that was made, but it is, undoubtedly, one other misadventure in this calamitous chapter of accidents.

On Mar. 16, 1953, two and a half years after the initiation of the proceedings, the solicitor for the applicant applied to the judge for leave to call another witness, viz., the applicant's sister who was living with her parents when the original contract of tenancy was made, and who later became the daughter-in-law of the original landlord. It was pointed out that the applicant and her advisers had not thought of calling that witness when originally they had asked to call another witness in December, 1950. The judge, no doubt recollecting what he had then said, rejected the application to call this further evidence, which might have been important. The judge then made the order which I have already mentioned, and in which, in terms going outside the rule under which he was purporting to act, he "rescinded" the order made by the registrar. It is from that order of rescission that this appeal comes to this court.

[HIS LORDSHIP summarised the facts which led to the litigation, and continued :] As to the law applicable, there is, I gather, no dispute. If Mr. Butler was the original tenant, then, since there had been increases in rent before his death, it is conceded that he was a statutory tenant at his death. It is, therefore, clear that, in that case, Mrs. Butler's continued occupation must have been in right of her claim to be the tenant within the meaning of the Acts, by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, and it is further conceded that, on that hypothesis, when Mrs. Butler died the utility of s. 12 (1) (g) to the Butler family was exhausted and the applicant can no longer invoke its provisions to protect her occupation. If, on the other hand, Mrs. Butler was the original tenant, then the applicant, it is again admitted, having satisfied s. 12 (1) (g) in all other respects, is entitled to rely on that section as qualifying her to be called the tenant within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The only question is one of fact, simple to state, but, as this litigation, which has gone on for two and a half years, shows, difficult to determine: Who was the tenant of 117 Gatton Road when the contract of tenancy came into existence?

By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1:

"... the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

Those last words make it plain, to my mind, that, where there is more than one member of the tenant's family so residing, there is express jurisdiction in the county court to decide, in default of agreement, which one of the family is to be entitled to the continued protection of the Act. The reference to "as may be decided ... by the county court" obviously contemplates that application may have to be made to the county court to decide that matter in the circumstances which I have mentioned.

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Rules, 1920, which were made pursuant to s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1920, deal, inter alia, with applications which might have to be made under one or other of the sections of the Act in which such applications were contemplated. To take other examples, s. 2 of the Act deals with increases of rent which are permissible, and sub-s. (1) (a) contains a proviso that the tenant may apply to the county court for an order suspending or reducing an increase on the grounds stated. Similarly, s. 6 and s. 9 contain other instances in which, by the Act, express provision is made empowering one or other party to the tenancy to apply to the county court for a specific purpose. The rules of 1920 were made under s. 17 (1) for the purpose of giving effect to those provisions. Section 17 (1) of the Act provides:

"The Lord Chancellor may make such rules and give such directions as he thinks fit for the purpose of giving effect to this Act . . ."

Above r. 1 of the rules of 1920 appears the heading:

"Applications under s. 2; s. 9; s. 12 (1) (g) or (3); s. 6; or s. 5 (6)."

Rule 1 is:

"An application to the county court under the Act . . . (d) by a member of the tenant's family under s. 12 (1) (g) . . . may be made . . . to the court in the district of which the premises are situate."

I have already read r. 7 and r. 19, and pointed out that, in the case of applications under s. 12 (1) (g) by a member of the tenant's family, the procedure is to be determined by the judge, who will decide, among other things, on whom such an application will be served.

An application under s. 12 (1) (g) is, to my mind, quite plainly an application for the purpose of determining, where there has been failure to reach agreement, which member of the tenant's family residing with him is to be entitled to the benefit of the Act. Such an application is expressly provided for in the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g) itself. An application such as was made in this case by the sole claimant after a parent's death to be entitled to the benefit of the statutory tenancy is not, properly speaking, an application under s. 12 (1) (g) at all. Section 12 (1) (g) is a definition section. If the applicant is right in what she alleges, then she is a tenant within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts and, as such, is entitled to the protection against eviction which is given, for example, by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3. I think that the significance of that point is exemplified by the form which the order took and, indeed, by the form of the application itself. The applicant asked for a declaration that she succeeded to the statutory tenancy. That, in a loose way, might be described as an application under s. 12 (1) (g), if by it is meant an application that she was the tenant within the meaning of the definition section. It is to be noted that the registrar made his order, no doubt in a form which he thought really met the point in the case, as follows: "Declare that the applicant is the statutory tenant of No. 117 Gatton Road." An application to be declared a statutory tenant is not, to my mind, an application under s. 12 (1) (g), which, as I have already said, is a definition section only. I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that where, as in this case, there is no question of competing claims between members of the family, there being only one possible tenant, the matter is not, within the meaning of r. 19, "an application under the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g)," with the result that all the proceedings which took place on the footing that it was, including the judge's direction to the registrar to decide the matter and the later application to the judge to vary his decision, seem to me to have been without the necessary foundation or jurisdiction.

One other matter may be mentioned to emphasise the view which I have expressed. The point taken by the landlord has nothing to do with the question which member of the family is entitled to the occupation of this house. The landlord's point—and it is the only issue in the case—is that Mr. Butler and not Mrs. Butler was the original tenant. That is the issue which the court is asked to determine, and it does not arise under s. 12 (1) (g), the application of which paragraph is not in dispute between the parties. I refer finally to the point which I noted earlier, namely, that by the terms of r. 19 an application to the judge following a decision by the registrar is limited to the purpose of "varying" the registrar's decision and not "rescinding" it. If the question be which one of two or more competing claimants is within the definition of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, "variation" is the appropriate, and the only appropriate, word. But if the question be, as it is here, whether or no the sole claimant is within the terms of the paragraph, then the application to the judge would be, not to vary, but to rescind the order made by the registrar, which was what the learned county court judge did on Mar. 16, 1953.

- A For those reasons, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the whole proceeding, from its inception onwards, was not properly within the rules under which the applicant purported to bring it and the landlord was content to debate it. When parties have travelled for two and a half years along a particular litigious road, I should be very sorry to tell them that the road which they have chosen was the wrong one and that they must start all over again, but there are other grounds on which, as it seems to me, the present decision of the county court judge could not be regarded as satisfactory, and,
- B on any view of the case, therefore, I think that the matter would have to be re-tried or re-considered. I have already referred to the view which, as I think, with all respect, the learned judge mistakenly took in rejecting applications for further evidence and to the misfortune in the form of the direction to Mr. Currin to give his opinion as an expert. The result then would be inevitably much the same, even though the technical difficulty of jurisdiction
- C was out of the way, but the misfortunes which have befallen the present case and the litigants involved in it, do, I venture to think, well illustrate the troubles which may arise if parties do not follow the rules but attempt to steer a course of their own devising for the determination of disputes between them.

- The view, however, that I have expressed about r. 1 and r. 19 is not the end of the case, for, alternatively, it has been suggested by both parties that, though
- D the matter was not within r. 1 and r. 19 and was not, properly speaking, an application under s. 12 (1) (g) at all, still the application was one which the court could competently decide as falling within the general language of s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, which reads:

- "A county court shall have jurisdiction to deal with any claim or other proceedings arising out of this Act or any of the provisions thereof, notwithstanding that by reason of the amount of claim or otherwise the case would not but for this provision be within the jurisdiction of a county court, and, if a person takes proceedings under this Act in the High Court which he could have taken in the county court, he shall not be entitled to recover any costs."

- F It is, I think, plain that that sub-section is directed, primarily at any rate, to giving to the county court jurisdiction over all matters arising under the Rent Acts even though, by reason of the value of the property or for other reasons, the High Court would have had jurisdiction. Had it not been for the two words "or otherwise", it would, in my judgment, have been impossible to contend that the present application for a declaration that, on the death of
- G Mrs. Butler, the applicant succeeded to the statutory tenancy was within the terms of s. 17 (2). Counsel on both sides, however, contended with considerable force that the county court's powers to make declaratory judgments are limited by the County Courts Acts so as only to be available when such declarations are ancillary to other relief, and that, therefore, the words "or otherwise", in s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, have the effect of giving to a county court jurisdiction—admittedly discretionary—to make a declaratory judgment in any
- H case, even though the declaration sought is not ancillary to any money or other claim. I do not think it necessary to express any concluded view whether that submission is right, and I am anxious not to do so, because if s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 gives to the county court power to make declaratory judgments, it is obvious that there may be many cases when that would be a useful jurisdiction and would well serve the interests of litigants in the county court. I am bound to say, however, that, in my opinion, a case such as the present one would not, prima facie, be a suitable case to be dealt with by means of a declaration of this sort. It may well be that in the present case there is, in truth, no dispute whatever between the parties save only the question who was the original tenant, but, if that is so, the case is, indeed, exceptional. My experience has taught me to expect that, when a landlord seeks possession of premises which are subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts and the defendant raises a claim to be a tenant by virtue of the definition in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, that is not likely to be the only issue raised. Moreover, applications for declaratory judgments do not appear to me well adapted to matters in which the only question is one of pure fact. Certainly the unhappy experience in this case is no strong advertisement for the use of s. 17 (2) in the present instance, but I do not desire, for reasons which I have already given, to express any further opinion on the sub-section, as I should be unwilling, unless I were compelled to do so (which I am not), to express an opinion which would limit the utility which may reside in the sub-section. Assuming, however, that this particular case was a matter within the competence of the county court under s. 17 (2), what is the consequence? In my judgment, if the parties attempt to tread this road, they get hardly any further along it than they got along the road labelled "r. 1 and r. 19", because, to sustain the subsequent proceedings, the first step in the action, viz., the reference to the registrar, must be justified. That reference was made by the judge, I assume, under r. 19 of the rules of 1920, which, for reasons already given, had no application. The only other way in which the matter could have been referred to the registrar would have been under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 90 (1), but it is, in my judgment, quite plain that the judge's direction to the registrar to hear and decide the case was not a reference to the registrar for inquiry and report under any of the provisions of s. 90 (1). The result, then, is that the decision of the registrar was made without jurisdiction and was a nullity, and it follows that all the subsequent proceedings which depended on it had no greater validity. On any view of the case, therefore, it seems to me that the proceedings were wholly ineffective. The order of this court should, I think, recite the opinion of the court that the original application was invalid and outside the jurisdiction of the registrar to determine, and should then discharge the order made by the county court judge on Mar. 16, and also, in case the effect of that should be to revive the registrar's earlier order, discharge his order also. In the circumstances, it seems to me that the fair and just order as to costs is that neither party recovers from the other any costs here or below.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. [His LORDSHIP summarised the facts, and continued:] I agree with the Master of the Rolls that r. 1 (d) and r. 19 of the rules of 1920 are not applicable to the facts of the case. I should also like to add my concurrence with the view which my Lord has expressed that under r. 7 (b) the judge was acting, not as an appellate judge, but as a judge of first instance. It is clear, in my opinion, that, for the reasons stated by my Lord, the proceedings which the applicant began, and which were resisted by the landlord, were really a nullity. I also agree with the Master of the Rolls that the purported reference to Mr. Gurrin, the handwriting expert, was not a reference to a referee for inquiry and report under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 90 (1), but that it merely put Mr. Gurrin in the position of an expert witness giving evidence in the case.

It is not necessary for the decision of this case to express a view about the true meaning of s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, but I should like to indorse the language used by the Master of the Rolls when he said that it would be a pity if anything were said in the present case to limit the operation of the sub-section in its utility, or, indeed, its application to similar or other facts in other cases brought under the Rent Restrictions Acts. [His LORDSHIP read s. 17 (2), and said:] On the face of it the effect of the sub-section seems to be that, since proceedings under the Rent Restrictions Acts have been committed to the jurisdiction of the county court, that court is to have power to deal with them notwithstanding that circumstances may arise which ordinarily would oust its jurisdiction. Counsel, however, contended that the words of the sub-section, "any claim . . . arising out of this Act", would cover proceedings such as those in the present case, viz., an application for a declaration which was not ancillary to any other claim. In my view, the facts of the present case would seem to make it extremely doubtful whether the proper or advantageous course was to seek a declaratory judgment, but, as we are determining the matter on the first point, viz., that the proceedings were ineffective, I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., that this court will discharge the order of the county court judge, without prejudice to anything which the parties may choose to do in the future.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree entirely with the judgment which has been delivered by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R. For the reason which he has given, the parties altogether misapprehended the effect of r. 1 (d) and r. 19 of the rules made under the Act of 1920. It is plain that all the problems which have arisen since the beginning of this unfortunate litigation two years ago have flowed directly from that mistake. With regard to s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, I would like to reserve my concluded view as to what the precise scope of that statutory provision is, but I agree with my brethren in thinking that it would be undesirable to say anything calculated to confine the apparent meaning of the sub-section, and I can well conceive that in some cases, particularly cases raising short questions of law, it would be desirable for the county court to have the suggested jurisdiction to make declarations of rights, in disputes arising under the Acts, wider than their normal jurisdiction under the county court procedure. Beyond that I prefer to say nothing on that sub-section. I quite agree with the order which my Lord has indicated.

ROBERTS v. DORMAN LONG & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), May 19, June 12, 1953.]

Building—Building regulations—Safety belts—Need to provide—“Adequate foothold”—“Available”—Provision of belts at office half a mile from place of work—Evidence of practice not to use belts—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 97.

As part of a building operation a steel frame was lifted by a crane into position between two stanchions at a height of seventy or eighty feet from the ground. The frame did not fall exactly into place, and, in order to guide it into position, a charge-hand employed by the defendants, who were erecting the building, climbed on to the topmost member of the frame which was twelve inches wide and sat astride it. He was able to “wrap” his legs underneath the cross-member and get some purchase on a diagonal bracing below. He had no safety belt, the nearest point at which safety belts were available being half a mile away. As the crane moved the frame he fell to the ground and was killed. In an action by his widow for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in which she alleged that the defendants were guilty of negligence and breach of their statutory duty under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 97, in not having available a safety belt for the use of the deceased, evidence was given that the work was not regarded as a particularly dangerous operation of steel erection, that special precautions were unnecessary, and that it was not the normal practice to use safety belts in such circumstances.

HELD: the charge-hand had not an “adequate foothold”, which meant something on which one could safely stand, within the meaning of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 97, and the safety belts were not “available”, which meant available at the place where they would be used, within the meaning of the regulation, and, therefore, whether or not it was likely that the charge-hand would have used a safety belt had one been available, the defendants were liable for breach of their statutory duty under reg. 97 to have safety belts available where there was no adequate foothold.

Judgment of BANKES, L.J., in A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool. Same v. Barclays Bank ([1924] 1 K.B. 789), applied.

Semble, employers are under no duty at common law to insist on the use of safety belts in such cases.

Evidence—Admissibility—Evidence at variance with particulars and other evidence—No objection by opposing party.

In an action for damages for breach of statutory duty to have safety belts available for the use of workers engaged in a building operation, the defence alleged that an adequate supply of safety belts was available, and particulars supplied stated that they were at the defendants' main office on the building site, and had been available since the defendants commenced operations on the site. The main office was about half a mile away from the place of work where they might be used. The trial proceeded on this basis, evidence for the defendants being given in accordance with the particulars, and, on an objection raised during his examination of a witness, counsel for the defendants disclaimed any intention of suggesting that there were any safety belts at a nearer point. The last witness for the defendants gave evidence that two safety belts were available at an office near the place of work, and, no objection being taken for the plaintiff, the evidence was admitted and acted on by the trial judge.

HELD: the evidence ought not to have been admitted.

APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of STREATFEILD, J., dated Dec. 11, 1952, giving judgment for the defendants in an action for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty brought under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

The plaintiff was the widow of a charge-hand, a steel erector, who had been employed by the defendants on the erection of a steel building and had fallen seventy feet from the cross-member of a Portal frame which was being put by a crane into position between two stanchions. She contended that the defendants were negligent in not providing a safe system of work and in breach of their statutory duty to make safety belts available where there was no "adequate handhold and foothold" under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 97. The defendants denied negligence and contended that there was adequate handhold and foothold and that safety belts were available, according to particulars supplied, at an office which according to the evidence was half a mile away. In the course of the trial the last witness for the defendants gave evidence that two safety belts were available at an office close to the site, and, in the absence of objection on behalf of the plaintiff, STREATFEILD, J., accepted the evidence, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 12. The following judgments were read.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The action out of which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiff under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, to recover damages for the death of her husband who was a steel erector employed by the defendants. He met his death by falling from a steel frame, known as a Portal frame, which was being fixed at a factory which was in course of construction by the defendants, a distance of between seventy and eighty feet. The action was based first on a breach of statutory duty, it being alleged that the defendants were in breach of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 97, and, secondly, or alternatively, negligence at common law. The learned judge entered judgment for the defendants.

The facts out of which the accident arose are that the deceased was a steel erector of long experience and was a charge-hand on the particular job on which he was working at the material time. It had become necessary to place a frame, called a Portal frame, between two upright stanchions, which were between seventy and eighty feet high and some forty or fifty feet apart. This apparently is a very ordinary operation, which takes place in the course of erecting steel buildings. The frame is raised from the ground by a crane, and then the crane carries the frame over the stanchions and lets it down so that the two ends of the frame will fall into position between the cleats which are already fastened to the stanchions. The ends then have to be centred into the exact position, so that the rivets which are to bolt the frame to the stanchions will go through the holes which are provided. It not infrequently happens that the frame does not fall exactly into position and has to be guided or worked to get the holes in apposition. For this purpose the men are provided with a tool called a podger, one end of which can be used as a lever for coaxing or levering the frame into position, while the other end is an ordinary spanner for tightening up the bolts or rivets. On the day in question two men, Mr. Davies and Mr. Slennet, were working under the deceased, and when the frame was lowered apparently all went well on the stanchion on which Mr. Davies had taken up his position. Mr. Slennet had some difficulty, and the deceased went to his assistance. He first stood on the lower member of the frame, but being unable to remedy the difficulty he climbed on to the top-most cross-member and sat astride of it. The cross-member was twelve inches wide, and it seems that, as he sat across it, he could wrap his legs underneath it and get some sort of purchase on a diagonal bracing which it was suggested gave him a perfectly good foothold. He had with him his podger, but it was impossible to see whether at the moment of the accident he was holding the podger with both hands. If he was not, he could get a handhold by holding on to a flange at the top of the member on which he was sitting. While he was in this position he gave a signal to the crane driver who swung the crane slightly to adjust the position of the frame, and as the frame moved he appears for some unexplained reason to have overbalanced and fallen off. It is quite obvious, as can be seen from the plan and the photographs, that the work involved these men being in a position which would ordinarily be called highly perilous, but apparently such an operation as this is all in the day's work of a steel erector, who is, no doubt, accustomed to working at great heights. The resident engineer of the defendants, Mr. Rideout, regarded this evidently as a job which was quite normal and usual and one in which it was quite unnecessary that any particular precaution should be taken for the safety of the men engaged in working at this height. He also regarded the diagonal bracing against which the deceased had rested or locked his feet as giving a perfectly satisfactory foothold, and apparently the learned judge so considered it.

Regulation 97 is in these terms:

"Safety nets, sheets and belts.—If the special nature or circumstances of any part of the work render impracticable compliance with the provisions of these regulations designed to prevent the fall of any persons engaged on that part of the work, then those provisions shall be complied with so far as practicable and except for persons for whom there is adequate handhold and foothold either there shall be provided suitable safety nets or safety sheets or there shall be available safety belts or other contrivances which will so far as practicable enable such persons who elect to use them to carry out the work without risk of serious injury."

On the question of adequate foothold I am unable to agree with the view of the learned judge. I think the ordinary meaning of the word "foothold" is standing ground, something on which a person can safely stand, and I cannot see that it can really be said, where a man is astride a twelve-inch girder or stanchion which is suspended in the air, that he has any foothold at all, although he may be able to rest his feet against a bracing such as existed in the construction of this frame, and if there was no foothold it is unnecessary to consider whether he had an adequate handhold. The regulation only excepts from its provisions persons for whom there is both adequate foothold and handhold.

The breach of duty which was alleged here was that the defendants had not made available any safety belts or other contrivances. The position with regard to the availability of safety belts is an important feature of this case. The action was tried at Swansea in December, 1952. As long ago as June 20, 1951, the plaintiff had required particulars stating precisely where the said safety belts were available and the number and type thereof, and as from what date it was alleged the same were available. These particulars were asked for because in para. 10 of the defence it was alleged that an adequate supply of safety belts was available for the workmen. The particulars delivered were that the safety belts were provided and kept at the defendants' main office on the site and had been available since the defendants commenced operations on the site. The main office which was referred to was a considerable distance away from the site where these men were working. Estimates of the distance varied from five hundred yards to three-quarters of a mile, and, perhaps, the most reliable estimate was given by a witness who said that the main office was ten minutes' walk away, which would indicate that it was somewhere about half a mile. Until the last day the case proceeded on that footing so far as the availability of belts was concerned, and, in my opinion, it would be impossible to hold that safety belts were available so as to comply with these regulations if they were kept at such a distance as that from the site on which the men were working. As I have said, the case proceeded on the footing that these belts were only to be found some half a mile away from the work, and, indeed, when an objection was taken in the course of the examination of a witness by counsel for the defendants that it might be taken that he was suggesting that the belts were somewhere nearer, he disclaimed any such intention and evidence was given by Mr. Rideout that, after the accident, he fetched two belts from the main office and put them in the cold mill office, which was the office adjacent to the place where the accident happened. Evidence was also given of notices which were posted near this work and were in these terms:

"All employees are reminded that a safety belt is available on request for any man who wishes to use one for a proper and reasonable purpose."

It will be noticed that the notice says nothing about where the belts were to be found.

On the last day of the trial, the very last witness called was a Mr. Rees Price, who had formerly been in the employ of the defendants as a foreman erector, and was the foreman employed on the day of the accident. In view of the particulars and the foregoing evidence, it was at least surprising to find that, according to him, there were at the date of the accident two belts hanging behind the door in the cold mill office. This was a matter which, of course, took the plaintiff's advisers entirely by surprise, and the great importance of the matter is emphasised by the fact that, when he came to give judgment, the learned judge accepted the evidence of Mr. Rees Price, finding that belts were available in the cold mill office. In my opinion, the learned judge ought not to have allowed such a complete departure from the particulars, especially as no notice whatever had been given to the plaintiff of this fact spoken to for the first time by Mr. Rees Price in the box. They had come to meet a case in which the defendants had stated perfectly definitely that such belts as there were were at the main office, and, considering also that Mr. Rideout spoke himself of having taken two belts to the cold mill office and did not suggest that there were any there other than those two which he took after the accident, the only inference that can be drawn with regard to Mr. Rees Price's evidence, especially in view of the length of time that had elapsed since the accident, is that he was mistaken and was speaking of the same belts as Mr. Rideout himself had taken to the cold mill office, but not until after the accident. In my opinion, therefore, the case ought to have proceeded on the footing that the only belts which the defendants provided were those at the main office, and, as I have already said, that was too far away for them to be regarded as available for the men if they wished to use them.

Accordingly, it appears to me that there was a breach of reg. 97. It was the duty of the defendants to have belts available, so that if a man elected to use one he could do so. There was, however, a good deal of evidence that steel erectors never use these belts unless they are going to do an operation which necessitates their going over the side of a crane. Mr. Price in his evidence was asked if he had ever seen a man use a safety belt at all. His answer was that he had on such operations as bolting the seating of a crane girder for which one goes over the side of the crane, and that, in the whole of his experience, he could only recollect three occasions when he had seen a belt used and then it was always for such an operation as he had just described. The witness, Mr. Slennet, however, said that, when he had been working for Sir William Arrol & Co., he had used a safety belt on many occasions and gave certain instances of work on which he had been engaged when he had worn one. It may well be that the learned judge could form the opinion on the evidence that it was unlikely that if safety belts had been available the deceased would have used one, but, in my opinion, once it is proved that the defendants had not got these belts available for them to say: "Well, even if we had them available the deceased would not have used them" is no answer. The fact that they were not available gave him no opportunity of exercising his election, and, had one been available and had he elected to use it, while it might not have prevented his meeting with some injury, it would certainly have prevented his falling to his death. Some actions for negligence are based on the failure of a person to make inquiries when the circumstances are such as to show that he was put on inquiry. If he is put on inquiry and makes none, it is no answer to say: "Well, if I had made the inquiry it would have led to no result". That is well established, and I need only refer to the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool. Same v. Barclays Bank (1) ([1924] 1 K.B. 789), and it seems to me that the two things are closely analogous. If a person who had to make an inquiry fails to do so he cannot be heard to say: "But even if I had it would have led to no useful result". So I think that, if a person is under a duty to provide safety belts or other appliances and fails to do so, he cannot be heard to say: "Well, if I had done so, they would not have been worn". For this reason I think that the plaintiff has established a breach of duty causing or contributing to her husband's death and that for a breach of the regulation she is entitled to recover.

I have more difficulty in holding that she would have been entitled to recover at common law. It is said that there is a common law duty, and undoubtedly there is, for an employer to provide a safe place of working and to take reasonable steps to guard against the consequences of his men being in a perilous situation. Considering that there is this regulation made expressly for the protection of persons working at heights or in places where there is no adequate handhold or foothold, and considering that the regulation, while requiring belts to be provided, leaves it to the employee to elect whether he will use one or not, I do not think that we can say that the employers are under a common law duty to insist on these men using the belts. It was suggested that they ought to be advised or urged to use them. Apart from the fact that the case below seems to have been fought entirely on the failure of the defendants to provide them, I do not think that we ought to hold that the defendants were under this duty, more especially having regard to the provisions of the regulation. No doubt, it does not follow that, because there are regulations dealing with a particular matter, observance of them exonerates the employers from any other common law duty which may not be covered by the regulations. Steel erection is an operation undoubtedly accompanied by considerable risks—risks which are well known both to employers and workmen and which must always exist whatever precautions are taken. For my part, I think it is safer to decide this case entirely on the breach of the regulation, and on that ground I would enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount assessed by the learned judge who was asked to fix the damages in the event of a successful appeal.

There will be judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of £4,500, apportioned as to £4,000 to the widow, £200 to the elder daughter, and £300 to the younger daughter, and the money must be brought into court and transferred to the Swansea County Court. The plaintiff will have the costs here and below.

BIRKETT, L.J., referred to the facts and continued: It was conceded that the building in course of erection came within the provisions of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and the main contest in the court below was on reg. 97, and in particular on the words “except for persons for whom there is adequate handhold and foothold either there shall be provided suitable safety nets or safety sheets or there shall be available safety belts or other contrivances which will so far as practicable enable such persons who elect to use them to carry out the work without risk of serious injury.”

Now to the ordinary layman, and I should have thought myself to anybody who considered the matter, the position of the deceased at the moment he fell to his death was one of considerable peril. Even assuming that he was familiar with the kind of work and that steel erectors were accustomed to do this kind of work almost daily, nevertheless a moment's reflection would show that a mere slip, a moment of forgetfulness in doing familiar work, or some quite unforeseen happening of any kind, might result in a sudden overbalancing with serious, and, in this case, fatal, consequences. But Mr. Rideout made these answers to counsel for the plaintiff:

“Q.—Supposing a man has to be five minutes up at a height of seventy or eighty feet, straddling a girder, with both hands engaged in holding a podger and having to exert great pressure. May I add one further thing. The girder is not fixed in position, but is suspended from a crane. Would you regard it as desirable in those circumstances for a belt to be used or not to be used? A.—I would not. I do not consider that a dangerous situation at all . . . Q.—Do you think that any safety precautions of any kind are required in performing the job which Roberts was engaged upon at the time when he met his death? A.—What he was doing was quite usual in steel work erection practice. Q.—It was quite usual in a dangerous occupation, was it? A.—There is an element of risk in steel-work erection, and he was not engaged on anything unusual. Q.—With respect, you are not answering my question. Is it your view that no safety precautions were required in the job which Roberts was engaged upon when he fell? A.—No, I do not think that any aids to safety were required in what he was doing.”

It was contended for the defendants that there was adequate handhold and foothold for the deceased, and, therefore, there was no obligation under the regulation for the defendants to supply safety nets or safety sheets, or to make available safety belts or other contrivances which would enable men who elected to use them to carry out their work without risk of serious injury. With regard to the handhold, it was said by Mr. Rideout that the top member on which the deceased was astride provided an adequate handhold because he was able to grip the side of it, but he also said that he might have to use both hands on the podger with which he was supplied, and, of course, at such times he would have no handhold at all. Mr. Rees Price, the foreman on the job at the time, said, in answer to the learned judge, that he would not have an adequate handhold, or, indeed, one at all, while he was doing the job, because he would have to use two hands on the podger. But apart altogether from the question of handhold, the regulation speaks of handhold and foothold. It was suggested by Mr. Rideout that the deceased man could have wrapped his legs round the diagonal bracing and could have locked his feet under it, and that that was an adequate foothold within the meaning of the regulation. The learned judge said that, although it was near the line, he thought that there was in fact an adequate handhold and foothold. With great respect to STREATFIELD, J., I do not agree. Whatever may be said about handhold, I am clearly of opinion that this was not a place where there was an adequate foothold giving plain English words their plain meaning. The definition of "foothold" in the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY is:

"A hold or support for the feet; a surface (secure or otherwise) for standing or walking on; firm or stable position of the feet."

The learned judge seems to have relied in some measure on an unreported Scottish case*, the exact facts of which were not before us. But he recognised that his decision on this point was possibly open to question, and, therefore, proceeded to deal with the case as though his decision could not stand. I am clearly of opinion that the facts of this case show that the deceased man had not an adequate foothold, and the later part of the regulation applies accordingly.

It was not contended for the plaintiff that the defendants should have provided safety nets or safety sheets, but it was said that they should have had safety belts available for the deceased so that he could elect whether he would use one or not. It was admitted that, had the deceased been wearing a safety belt, he would not have fallen to his death. There was also a good deal of evidence that men in the deceased's position did not use safety belts, even when they were available. But what was said by the defendants in the present case was that they had fulfilled their duty under the regulation by having suitable safety belts available.

On this point a most remarkable situation developed on the evidence. Mr. Rideout had said that safety belts were available in the main office in the melting shop section, and a curiously worded notice was produced which read:

Mr. Rideout said that one of these notices was exhibited in the main window of the melting shop section, and in the hut in the cold mill section, and possibly one in the window of the foreman's office on the cold mill site, but he could not quite remember.

The main office in the melting shop section was about ten minutes' walk away from the place where the deceased man was working. Mr. Rideout was asked the specific question whether there were any other safety belts on any other part of the site and he said quite plainly: "Not at that time; not as far as I knew". When asked by the learned judge whether there were any in the men's cabin he said: "Not as far as I know at that time"; and when it was stated by counsel for the plaintiff that counsel for the defendants had suggested to Mr. Slennet, a witness who was working with the deceased at the time he fell to his death, that safety belts were available in the men's cabin, counsel for the defendants at once said: "If I did, it was quite an inadvertence". Further, it is to be observed that, after another accident of a similar kind, Mr. Rideout said:

"I took steps to have these new notices posted up and I also fetched two belts from the melting shop office to the cold mill office. I thought myself that if they were actually visible to a man they might have the effect of subduing nervous reaction."

The learned judge then asked Mr. Rideout:

"As far as you know that was the first time belts had been visible in the cold mill office? A.—That was the first time as far as I know."

The learned judge came to the conclusion that having safety belts at the main office was not a compliance with the regulation. The words that he used about that were these:

"Now what is meant by 'making available'? 'Making available' to my mind must mean to make reasonably available to the men who elect to use them. Quite clearly if a man desires to elect to use a safety belt it is no good telling him that those belts are situated some half a mile or three-quarters of a mile away. That is not, in my judgment, 'available' within the meaning of these regulations. In my judgment, that duty entails an obligation on the employers to have available on the site where a man who, in special circumstances perhaps, makes up his mind that he desires to use a belt, may get one and get it reasonably quickly."

* Carnie v. Redpath, Brown & Co., Ltd., Court of Session, Mar. 21, 1951, unrep.

A I agree with the learned judge on that matter, but then he went on to say that the defendants had complied with the regulation, because safety belts were available in the foreman's office only forty yards away from the site. He based this conclusion on some evidence that was given by Mr. Rees Price, the foreman, right at the very end of the case. He said that he had seen two safety belts behind the door in his office before the date of the accident. Mr. Rideout
B said he brought two safety belts to that office after the accident.

The defendants had pleaded in their defence, delivered on May 18, 1951, that safety belts were available, that the deceased man knew they were available and had neglected to use one, and that his death was due to his own negligence in not providing for his own safety by using a safety belt.
C When asked to particularise where the belts were available and the number and type available, and as from what date it was alleged that the safety belts were available, they answered on July 9, 1951, that the safety belts were kept at the main office and had been available there since work began on this site. Nothing could be clearer, and right up to the last moment the case had been conducted on that footing. When the evidence of Mr. Rees Price emerged it
D was clearly a great surprise to counsel for the defendants, but no objection was taken to the admissibility of the evidence, counsel for the plaintiff, no doubt, thinking that that evidence could not possibly stand against the evidence of Mr. Rideout, Mr. Davies and Mr. Slennet, and the earlier repudiation of counsel for the defendants. In my opinion, the evidence ought not to have been allowed at that stage of the case, though in the absence of any objection the learned judge admitted it. It was in flat defiance of the particulars which
E had been expressly asked for and given, and in any event, in my opinion, it ought not to have been accepted and allowed to be the decisive element in the widow's action when all the evidence had been considered. When Mr. Rideout brought his two belts after the accident because he was afraid of the effect of the accident on the morale of the men, it is a most amazing thing that he should never have mentioned those that were already there if they were there,
F as Mr. Rees Price suggested, which made his bringing of two belts quite unnecessary. The learned judge seems to have overlooked the nature of the particulars, the evidence which had already been given, the disavowal by counsel for the defendants, and the obvious possibility of mistake.

I am of opinion that the breach of statutory duty was proved, and I do not think that it is any answer to a breach of that duty to say that had it been
G fulfilled the result would have been the same. The deceased man had no right of election given to him such as the regulations provide, and the defendants were guilty of a breach of the regulations which occasioned or contributed to the death of the deceased man. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed and that the plaintiff should have the damages assessed by H STREATFIELD, J.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The claim based on negligence at common law (apart from one allegation not pursued) was particularised as follows: (a) Failing to provide safety nets or sheets, safety belts, ropes, or other precautions against falling. (b) Failing by notice, warning instructions, or otherwise, to insist on or require the use of such safety measures as aforesaid, if such were provided, which is denied. (c) Allowing or requiring the deceased to work at dangerous heights without such safety measures or appliances as aforesaid and without any precautions being taken against the risk of falling. (d) Failing to make easily available at the site of the aforesaid work such safety appliances as were necessary.

Counsel for the plaintiff did not contend that safety nets or sheets were appropriate. He based his case on the absence of safety belts which he said the defendants should have insisted on the men using. He did not suggest any other precaution which should have been taken against falling. The case was thus fought on the following questions: (a) whether safety belts were required; (b) whether they were available; (c) whether the defendants should have insisted on their use.

In considering these questions from the common law aspect one cannot, I think, consider them in dissociation from the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, of which reg. 97, here relied on, deals specifically with safety belts. The provision of safety belts is said to be part of a safe system of work, but, as SOMERVELL, L.J., said in England v. National Coal Board (2) ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1198):

"The reasonable employer is entitled to assume . . . that the dangers which would occur to a reasonable man have occurred to Parliament or the framers of the regulations."

This is not to say that the regulations are exhaustive, but it seems to me that reg. 97, to which I shall have to refer later, is there for the purpose of defining the employer's obligations in what may be described as the ordinary processes of the work. In exceptional circumstances, or, as the learned judge said, where some special peril is going to be met with, the common law duty is not to be restricted by the regulations. A case, for example, might arise in which an employer must insist on the use of safety belts. In this case, on the facts as proved and found by the learned judge, the ordinary practice of steel erection was being followed, the jamming of the frame was not an unusual occurrence, and there was nothing unusual or exceptionally perilous in the methods employed in doing the work. As LORD TUCKER said in General Cleaning Contractors, Ltd. v. Christmas (3) ([1952] 2 All E.R. 1117), speaking of the employers of window cleaners who are employed in what is obviously a hazardous occupation:

"Their only duty is to take reasonable steps to provide a system which will be reasonably safe, having regard to the dangers necessarily inherent in the operation."

Bearing these considerations in mind, I am driven to the conclusion that this case falls to be determined on whether or not the employers were in breach of reg. 97 which reads as follows:

"Safety nets, sheets and belts.—If the special nature or circumstances of any part of the work render impracticable compliance with the provisions of these regulations designed to prevent the fall of any persons engaged on that part of the work, then those provisions shall be complied with so far as practicable and except for persons for whom there is adequate handhold and foothold either there shall be provided suitable safety nets or safety sheets or there shall be available safety belts or other contrivances which will so far as practicable enable such persons who elect to use them to carry out the work without risk of serious injury."

It will be observed that under the regulation no onus is placed on the employers to insist on the use of safety belts. The election is left to the man. If they were in breach and the breach was the cause of the accident the defendants are liable but not otherwise.

First: Was there adequate handhold and foothold? The learned judge found that there was adequate handhold, and in this I agree with him notwithstanding the fact that if the workman were using two hands he would not at a given moment have a hand grasping any particular hold. As to foothold the learned judge came to the conclusion, though with less certainty, that there was adequate foothold. Here I find myself in disagreement with him. The word "foothold" in the context in which it appears in the regulation does, in my opinion, mean some place on which a man can place at least part of his foot so as to give him a stable position. The deceased was not in such a position, being able only to wrap his legs round an upright or diagonal piece of steel underneath the member on which he was seated. Moreover, he was not on a fixed structure at all, being on a frame which at the material time was suspended from the jib of a crane. I would, therefore, find that there was no adequate handhold and foothold.

A The next question is: Were safety belts available? The evidence, apart from that of one witness to whom I shall refer again, was all one way. It was in accordance with the case pleaded for the defendants by their particulars delivered on July 9, 1951, viz., that the belts were left at the defendants' main office. This office was about half a mile away from the place where the deceased was killed and the learned judge held, and I agree with him, that if they were in that place they were not available within the language of the regulation. One witness, however, the foreman, Mr. Rees Price, who at the time of the trial was working for other employers, said that before the accident there were two or three safety belts in the office at the cold mill site where the accident occurred. This evidence ought not, I think, to be accepted. That belts were there after the accident there is no doubt. Mr. Rideout, the resident engineer at the defendants' works, said that the belts were kept at the main office and that after the accident he fetched two belts thence and took them to the cold mill office, that is to say, the office on the site. This fits in with the evidence of Mr. Rees Price if the latter was mistaken in thinking that the belts were there before the accident. I think this must be the explanation of the foreman's evidence, but, however that may be, I cannot think that this evidence ought to be allowed to sustain a finding that the belts were in fact available on the cold mill site on the day of the accident. It was contrary to the pleaded case.

D No questions were put in cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses (except unintentionally) to show that there was any issue as to the place where they said the belts were kept, viz., the main office, half a mile away. The issue was first raised when Mr. Rees Price went into the witness box after Mr. Rideout had already given the evidence I have mentioned. No amendment was ever made or sought, although Mr. Rees Price had been seen by the defendants' solicitors a month before the trial. For these reasons I think that his evidence, in so far as it conflicts with the other evidence given on both sides on the point, must be rejected.

I would, accordingly, find that safety belts were not available for such persons who elected to use them. If this is so, I think it cannot lie in the mouth of the defendants to say that this was not the cause of the accident on the ground that the probabilities are that the deceased would never have elected to use a belt. The man having been killed, there is no possibility of finding out whether he would have exercised his election one way or the other, and I must decline to assume that he would not have elected to use a safety belt if one had been available. I would, therefore, allow the appeal on the ground that the plaintiff has proved that the accident in which her husband was killed was caused by the defendants' breach of the duty imposed on them by reg. 97.

PRESTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL v. PICKAVANCE.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), April 14, 15, June 25, 1953.]

Rent Control—Security of tenure—Power to extend period—Notice to quit given more than three months after decision of tribunal—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 5—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 11 (1), (2) (b).

On Sept. 8, 1950, a tenant having referred his contract of tenancy of a furnished house to a rent tribunal under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, the tribunal gave a decision approving the rent and giving no direction as to security of tenure. On Dec. 9, 1950 (i.e., three months and one day after the tribunal's decision) the landlord served on the tenant a notice to quit expiring on Dec. 18. On Dec. 9, on being served with the notice, the tenant applied to the tribunal under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1949 for an extension of his period of tenure. On Jan. 19, 1951, the tribunal made an order extending that period, and subsequently made further orders granting extension.

HELD: although s. 11 of the Act of 1949 was (by virtue of s. 11 (5) thereof) to be construed as one with the Act of 1946, it did not follow that "notice to quit" in s. 11 (1) must refer to the notice with which s. 5 of the Act of 1946 was concerned, namely, a notice to quit served by the lessor at any time before the decision of the tribunal or within three months thereafter; s. 11 applied to any case where a notice to quit had been served and the period at the end of which it took effect had not expired; and, therefore, the tribunal had power under s. 11 (2) (b) of the Act of 1949 to grant the extensions of tenure which they had ordered.

APPEAL by the Preston and Area Rent Tribunal, as the successors of the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal, from an order of the Court of Appeal dated May 15, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 9, affirming the grant of an order of certiorari made by the Divisional Court, dated Feb. 12, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 455, directed to the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal to bring up and quash directions given by the tribunal on Sept. 7 and Oct. 16, 1951.

The Court of Appeal (SOMERVELL and MORRIS, L.JJ., JENKINS, L.J., dissenting) held that the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 11 (2) (b), operated only on notices to quit covered by the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 5, and, therefore, the tribunal had no power to grant any extension of tenure under s. 11 (2) (b) where the notice to quit had been served more than three months after the tribunal's decision on the tenant's reference to them of his contract of tenancy.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.), J. P. Ashworth and R. J. Parker for the appellants, the tribunal.

The House took time for consideration.

A June 25. The following opinions were read.

B LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal dismissing an appeal of the appellants' predecessors, the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal, from a judgment of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, which ordered that directions given by that rent tribunal on Sept. 7, 1951, and Oct. 16, 1951, be removed into the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, and that thereupon those directions be quashed. By an order dated Nov. 5, 1952, the present appellants, who now represent the former rent tribunal, were substituted as a party in its place. The question involved in this case concerns primarily the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 5, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 11. Section 5 of the Act of 1946 is in the following terms:

C "If, after a contract to which this Act applies has been referred to a tribunal by the lessee or by the local authority (either originally or for re-consideration), a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates is served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter, the notice shall not take effect before the expiration of the said three months: Provided that—
D (a) the tribunal may, if they think fit, direct that a shorter period shall be substituted for the said three months in the application of this section to the contract that is the subject of the reference; and (b) if the reference is withdrawn, the period during which the notice is not to take effect shall end on the expiration of seven days from the withdrawal of the reference."

Section 11 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (hereinafter called "the Act of 1949"), is in the following terms:

F "(1) Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal under that Act, and the reference has not been withdrawn, the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period: Provided that an application shall not be made under this section where the tribunal have directed under para. (a) of the proviso to s. 5 of the Act of 1946, that a shorter period shall be substituted for the period of three months specified in that section as the period before the end of which a notice to quit shall not have effect. (2) On an application being made under this section—
G (a) the notice to quit to which the application relates shall not, unless the application is withdrawn, have effect before the determination of the application; (b) the tribunal, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party an opportunity of being heard, or, at his option, of submitting representations in writing, may direct that the notice to quit shall not have effect until the end of such period, not exceeding three months from the date at which the notice to quit would have effect apart from the direction, as may be specified in the direction; (c) if the tribunal refuse a direction under this section, the notice to quit shall not have effect before the expiration of seven days from the determination of the application. (3) On coming to a determination on an application under this section the tribunal shall notify the parties of their determination. (4) Where on an application under this section the tribunal have refused a direction under sub-s. (2) thereof, no subsequent application under this section shall be made in relation to the same notice to quit. (5) This section shall be construed as one with the Act of 1946, and references in this section to that Act shall be construed as references to that Act as extended by s. [7] of this Act."

The facts are not in dispute, and so far as material to be herein stated, are as follows:—Ethel Pickavance is the owner of a dwelling-house situate at and known as 51, Rodney Street, St. Helens, in the county of Lancaster, and on or about Aug. 1, 1948, let it furnished to William John Leyland on a weekly tenancy at a rent of £1 per week. On Aug. 1, 1950, William John Leyland referred that contract to the St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal under the provisions of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2. The tribunal heard the parties and gave their decision on Sept. 8, 1950. They approved the rent and did not reduce the statutory period of three months during which a notice to quit would not take effect. On Dec. 9, 1950, i.e., three months and one day after their decision, a notice to quit 51, Rodney Street, was served on William John Leyland to vacate by Dec. 18, 1950. On the same day that the notice to quit was served, William John Leyland applied to the rent tribunal under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 11, for an extension of the period at the end of which the notice to quit was to take effect, and on Jan. 19, 1951, the rent tribunal heard the application, granted the application and extended the period. On Mar. 6, 1951, before the extended period had expired, he again applied for a further extension, and was granted an extension until June 16, 1951. On June 4, 1951, a third application was made to the rent tribunal for a further extension, and on Sept. 7 the rent tribunal extended the period until Sept. 11, 1951. Finally, on Sept. 9, 1951, a further application was made, and on Oct. 16, 1951, the rent tribunal directed that the period should be extended until Dec. 11, 1951. On Dec. 7, 1951, pursuant to leave granted by a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Ethel Pickavance applied by notice of motion dated Jan. 10, 1952, to the Divisional Court for an order of certiorari to remove into the High Court and quash the two directions of the rent tribunal given respectively on Sept. 7, 1951, and Oct. 16, 1951. The application was heard on Feb. 12, 1952, by a Divisional Court, which unanimously granted the order of certiorari and quashed the directions. The St. Helens and Area Rent Tribunal thereupon appealed to the Court of Appeal, and on May 15, 1952, that court, JENKINS, L.J., dissenting, gave judgment, dismissing the appeal with costs. Leave was given to the rent tribunal to lodge a petition of appeal to your Lordships' House on condition that, if successful, they would not seek to disturb the order as to costs in the Court of Appeal and would not ask for costs of the hearing before your Lordships.

Before the true construction of the relevant sections is discussed, it is, I think, desirable to bear in mind the exact position of the tenant at the time when the three months' protection given by the Act of 1949 came to an end. At that moment he was still in possession of the premises under his contract of tenancy, and no application for an extension of time was then necessary. Indeed, subject to the possibility that notice might be given at some future date, there was nothing of which to ask an extension. It would only be required if, as the respondent asserts, the tribunal had jurisdiction only to grant its first extension, provided application was made within the statutory three months. It is in the light of these circumstances that the material sections of the two Acts have to be construed.

In this state of facts, the appellants contend that their case plainly comes within the provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1949. The contract, they say, had been referred to a tribunal and had not been withdrawn. A notice to quit had been served, and the period at which the notice took effect had not expired. The scheme adopted in the two Acts apparently was that the termination of the tenancy brought about by the notice should not take effect until the hearing should be concluded, and under the earlier Act that the tenancy itself should be extended to a date three months after the determination of the application by the tribunal. So far as I understood the argument on behalf of the respondent, the method by which protection is given to the tenant is so interpreted by both sides: the only difference between the parties being whether the first application for extension must be made within the three months.

The argument on behalf of the respondent was, as I think, most succinctly put by MORRIS, L.J., in the Court of Appeal when he said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 20):

"The requirement that s. 11 must be construed as one with the Act of 1946 makes it inappropriate to consider the words of s. 11 (1) in isolation. The phrase ' . . . at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect . . . has not expired ' refers, in my judgment, to the period between the serving of a notice to quit and its time of taking effect. But the words ' a notice to quit ' are not explained. It is not specified by whom the notice is to be given nor is there any mention as to the time of its service. This omission is explained if the reference is to a notice to quit as specified in the Act of 1946. It is only in s. 5 of the Act of 1946 that a notice to quit is referred to. The phrase ' a notice to quit ' in s. 11 (1), in my judgment, denotes a notice to quit of the particular kind set out in s. 5, that is, a notice to quit served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter. The important words of s. 11 (1) are as follows: ' . . . at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired . . . ' If the period at the end of which ' the notice ' takes effect is being fixed by virtue of the Act of 1946—it is plain that ' the notice ' referred to is a notice to quit served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter. It is a notice to quit of the same kind which, in my judgment, is referred to if the period at the end of which the notice takes effect is being fixed by virtue of the contract or by virtue of s. 11."

Undoubtedly, if it were not for the provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1949, the landlady would be entitled to possession at the end of the three months, or at the moment at which the notice to quit expired, whichever might be the later date, and in that case no extension beyond the relevant period could be given. But the material period is not necessarily the ending of the three months, it may be the termination of the period of a notice that ends at a later date. What, then, is the effect of the provisions of s. 11? I cannot say that I myself gain any assistance in construing it from the insertion of the words "at any time": they are qualified by the condition that a notice to quit must have been "served", and that the date for quitting the premises should not have expired, but in no other way. Nor am I helped by the provision that the reference must not have been withdrawn. Its object is to ensure that the applicant should make up his mind once for all which course he intends to adopt. Taking the wording of s. 11 by itself, every word is given due weight if the construction propounded by the appellants is adopted—and notably so in the phrase

"the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired."

This expression seems to deal with three separate periods within which an application for extension may be made, i.e., (i) if the contractual period of notice is still running; (ii) if that period has been extended by the three months respite given by the Act of 1946; and (iii) if a further extension has been given under the Act of 1949 and application is made before that extension has expired.

On the other hand, if the respondent's construction is adopted, I find it difficult to attribute their full and natural effect to the words "by virtue of the contract". According to the construction contended for on her behalf as I understand it, "the period at the end of which a notice takes effect by virtue of the contract" must be limited to the period at which a notice to quit which has been given within the three months' exemption has not expired. The whole strength of the respondent's argument depends on an insistence that, inasmuch as under s. 11 (5) of the Act of 1949 that section is to be construed as one with the Act of 1946, a notice to quit under both sections has the same connotation. Under s. 5, the notice to quit must be a notice served on the lessee before the decision of the tribunal or within three months afterwards: therefore, it is argued, s. 11 applies only where a notice has been given within this time: the two sections should be read as if they had been inserted consecutively in the same Act and applied to the same circumstances. Even if they had been so inserted in one Act, I should not have taken this view. I cannot see that the provisions of s. 11 require, or even suggest, such a construction. The expression "the period at the end of which the notice to quit takes effect . . . by virtue of the contract" is couched in the widest terms and, prima facie, refers to any notice whenever given which is still running. No doubt the giving of further time must be an extension of an existing tenancy, but, in the present case, the tenant remained in possession as a contractual tenant until the expiry of the notice to quit and was still a tenant until that moment. He comes under s. 11 because the only step taken to end his tenancy was the notice to quit given on Dec. 9, 1950, and the period of that notice had not expired.

It is suggested that to construe the section in this way is a hardship on the landlord because, if it be right, a tenant who had once made an application to the tribunal might, at some long subsequent time, apply for an extension. But this argument assumes that the landlord refrains from giving notice until a remote future time. In fact, he always has the remedy in his own hands: he can give notice at any time; a notice which may even end before the three months though it will not be effective until after that date. Moreover, it has to be borne in mind that the Act of 1949 does not provide that s. 11 is to be read with s. 5 of the earlier Act: it is to be read with that Act generally, and there are many other provisions of that Act to which that reference is applicable, e.g., s. 2 (1) and (3). Such an application seems to me to justify the use of the words "read with" in s. 11 of the Act of 1949, and negatives the necessity of confining the meaning of those words in that Act to a notice such as would be required under s. 5 of the Act of 1946. The expression "notice to quit" is a well-known form of words which conveys a well recognised meaning and should be given its ordinary significance unless there is some overriding necessity for limiting their scope. No doubt it is in one sense a hardship on the landlord to be subject in the case of a furnished lodging to a suspension of his right to recover possession. But this hardship exists in the case of an unfurnished tenancy, where the restriction is plainly established, and there is nothing exceptional in finding a limitation, though to a lesser degree, where the premises are let furnished.

It is urged, however, that to accept the appellants' contention would be to make a substantial alteration by an amending law which is destructive of the earlier provisions, and such cases as Union of South Africa (Minister of Rys. & Harbours) v. Simmer & Jack Proprietary Mines (1) ([1918] A.C. 596), Aristoc, Ltd. v. Rysta, Ltd. (2) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 42) and River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson (3) (2 App. Cas. 763) were quoted in support of the contention that an amending statute should not be so construed. What is a substantial alteration may be a matter of some difficulty, but in the present case I do not find the alteration said to be effected either so substantial or destructive of the provisions of the earlier Act as to lead me to reject what I think is the more obvious meaning. Moreover, it is at least arguable that s. 11 does make an alteration in one matter. Section 5 applies only in a case where the contract has been referred to the tribunal by the lessee or local authority. Under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946, however, either the lessor, or lessee, or local authority, may refer it, and, therefore, as the two Acts are to be construed as one, s. 11 of the Act of 1949 enables a lessee to apply to the tribunal for an extension not only where he himself has referred the matter but also where his lessor has done so.

The Divisional Court have found some support for their decision in R. v. Folkestone & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sharkey (4). The decision in that case was that neither section could be called in aid where a notice had been given before the tenant's application was made to the tribunal: a decision which I should have thought clearly right on the wording of s. 5. But it is suggested that the reasoning in that case showed that the object of s. 5 was to prevent retaliation by the landlord, as LORD GODDARD, C.J., says, and that s. 11 gave no new power to the tribunal. I cannot, myself, accept so limited an application. Obviously the later Act did give some new power, since without it there could have been no additional extension of the tenancy. The only question is how far that power extends.

It will be observed that in this analysis I have made no reference to the anomalies which would result from either of the constructions sought to be put on the section. My reason for adopting this course is that, admittedly, whichever reading is preferred, unconsidered and anomalous results must follow. They have been referred to in the Court of Appeal by SOMERVELL and MORRIS, L.JJ., on the one side, and by JENKINS, L.J., on the other. To my mind, they cancel one another out and neither party can draw any satisfactory support from them. I found my decision on what I regard as the natural meaning of s. 11 and see no sufficient reason for limiting its effect. I would allow the appeal.

My Lords, LORD OAKSEY is not able to be present, and he has asked me to say that he has had the advantage of reading the opinion of LORD REID, which will be read hereafter, and he agrees with it.

LORD REID: My Lords, the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, provided for tribunals being set up to deal with rents of furnished houses and other residential accommodation not covered by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The lessor, or the lessee, or the local authority, may apply to the local tribunal and the tribunal may approve the rent payable under the parties' contract or reduce it or dismiss the application. If a rent is approved or reduced it is entered in a register and no more than that rent can thereafter be charged for the premises. But on change of circumstances the case can be re-considered by the tribunal, and then the rent may be either increased or reduced. Apparently, it was thought that if the lessee or the local authority applied to the tribunal, the lessor might seek to retaliate by giving notice to quit, and, as such premises are often held by the lessee on as little as a week's notice, the possibility of such retaliation might well deter lessees or local authorities from applying to the tribunal. Accordingly, the Act, by s. 5, gives a limited measure of security of tenure to lessees. Section 5 is in the following terms:

"If, after a contract to which this Act applies has been referred to a tribunal by the lessee or by the local authority (either originally or for re-consideration), a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates is served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter, the notice shall not take effect before the expiration of the said three months: Provided that—(a) the tribunal may, if they think fit, direct that a shorter period shall be substituted for the said three months in the application of this section to the contract that is the subject of the reference; and (b) if the reference is withdrawn, the period during which the notice is not to take effect shall end on the expiration of seven days from the withdrawal of the reference."

For the purposes of the present case it is, I think, enough to note (i) that if the application to the tribunal was made by the lessor, then s. 5 has no effect, and the lessor is entitled at any time to give and enforce notice to quit in the ordinary way; (ii) that if the application was made by the lessee or local authority, the protection given by the Act applies whether or not the applicant was successful in getting the rent reduced and that protection can only be modified by the tribunal giving a direction under proviso (a) to s. 5; and (iii) that the Act does not invalidate any notice to quit, but only provides that notices which would otherwise have taken effect within three months after the decision of the tribunal shall not take effect until that period has elapsed. Whether or not s. 5 confers any benefit on the lessee depends, not on the date when notice to quit is given, but on whether the notice would, or would not, have taken effect before the expiry of the three months, and a notice given within the three months but not due to take effect until after that period is not touched by the section. In effect, the Act provides that the lessee's occupation cannot be brought to an end by the lessor within the three months unless the tribunal gives a direction which allows that to be done. And there is nothing in the Acts enabling the period of three months to be extended.

Three years later the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was passed, and one of its objects was "to amend the Rent of Furnished Houses Control (Scotland) Act, 1943, and the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, as respects security of tenure"

(I quote from the long title of the Act). The only section of the Act which deals with the position in England is s. 11. Section 11 is in the following terms:

"(1) Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal under that Act, and the reference has not been withdrawn, the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period: Provided that an application shall not be made under this section where the tribunal have directed under para. (a) of the proviso to s. 5 of the Act of 1946, that a shorter period shall be substituted for the period of three months specified in that section as the period before the end of which a notice to quit shall not have effect. (2) On an application being made under this section— (a) the notice to quit to which the application relates shall not, unless the application is withdrawn, have effect before the determination of the application; (b) the tribunal, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party the opportunity of being heard, or, at his option, of submitting representations in writing, may direct that the notice to quit shall not have effect until the end of such period, not exceeding three months from the date at which the notice to quit would have effect apart from the direction, as may be specified in the direction; (c) if the tribunal refuse a direction under this section, the notice to quit shall not have effect before the expiration of seven days from the determination of the application. (3) On coming to a determination on an application under this section the tribunal shall notify the parties of their determination. (4) Where on an application under this section the tribunal have refused a direction under sub-s. (2) thereof, no subsequent application under this section shall be made in relation to the same notice to quit. (5) This section shall be construed as one with the Act of 1946, and references in this section to that Act shall be construed as references to that Act as extended by s. [7] of this Act."

The sole question before your Lordships is whether s. 11 has any application in this case. In 1948 the respondent let to a Mr. Leyland a furnished house in St. Helens on a weekly tenancy. In August, 1950, the tenant made an application to the local tribunal with the object of getting his rent reduced, but he was unsuccessful, and on Sept. 8 the tribunal approved the existing rent of £1 per week. Section 5 of the Act of 1946 would have applied if the respondent had given notice to quit to take effect before Dec. 8, but she did not do so. She did, however, give notice to quit on Dec. 9 to take effect on Dec. 18. During the currency of this notice the tenant made application to the tribunal under s. 11 of the Act of 1949 for extension of the period of notice and the tribunal extended the period until Mar. 11, 1951. Further applications were made, and granted, by which the period was successively extended to June 16, Sept. 11 and Dec. 11. The respondent had objected to all these applications on certain grounds, but she had not questioned the power of the tribunal to grant them. But when the matter came before the court she took the point that the case had never fallen within the scope of s. 11 because s. 11 only applies if notice to quit has been given within three months of the date of the decision of the tribunal, and her notice was not given within that period. She maintained that the tribunal had no power to grant any of these applications, and that is the point which is now in issue.

That question depends on the proper interpretation of the initial part of s. 11. The first three requirements of the section are, undoubtedly, satisfied in this case. The contract was one to which the Act of 1946 applied, it was referred to a tribunal under that Act, and the reference was not withdrawn. The section then provides:

"the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period."

Certainly this phraseology is involved and it requires careful analysis, but after studying it I do not think that there can be much doubt about what these words would mean if they were read by themselves. The real difficulty begins when one reads them in their context, but first one must see what they would mean by themselves. The words between the commas state the limits of time between which the lessee may apply to the tribunal; he may apply at any time between the service of the notice to quit and the expiry of the period at the end of which the notice is due to take effect. The words within the brackets set out the three possible ways in which the period of notice would come to an end and the notice would take effect if it were not extended by application under s. 11. First, a notice may take effect by virtue of the contract: that applies in a case where the Act of 1946 has not extended the period of notice, because the date when the notice to quit would take effect in the ordinary way is more than three months after the date of the decision of the tribunal. Secondly, a notice may take effect by virtue of the Act of 1946: that applies in a case where the notice to quit would, but for that Act, have taken effect before the expiry of the three months, but s. 5 has prevented that and has extended the period of notice to the end of the three months. And thirdly, a notice may take effect by virtue of "this section", i.e., s. 11 of the Act of 1949: that applies in a case where the lessee has already obtained one or more extensions under s. 11 and is seeking a further extension, and he must then apply for that before the end of the last extension. There are no words which state that the section only applies if the notice to quit has been given within some time limit: and there are no words which state that the section applies if the notice is given at any time. The words "at any time" which follow the comma do not refer to the time when the notice may be given: they refer to the time when application may be made to the tribunal. So the words with which I have been dealing do not enact any limitation of time within which notice to quit must be given if s. 11 is to apply, but they do not exclude such a limitation being read in by implication if a sufficient reason for doing this can be found elsewhere.

The part of s. 11 on which the respondent relies as requiring such a limitation is sub-s. (5) which provides—"This section shall be construed as one with the Act of 1946 . . ." In my opinion, this means neither more nor less than that s. 11 must be read as if it were a section in the Act of 1946. There is no difficulty about so reading it. It does not alter or amend anything in the Act of 1946. It adds something new, which is materially different in character from anything in the Act of 1946. The lessee's right under s. 5 of that Act arises automatically, but it can only last for a short time. The lessee's right under s. 11 of the Act of 1949 only arises on an express decision of the tribunal, but if the tribunal so choose it can be continued for an indefinitely long period. The respondent's argument requires that s. 11 shall be treated as in some way subordinate to s. 5. The argument was put in various ways. It was said that "notice to quit" in s. 11 must have the same limited meaning and scope as it has in s. 5, which is the only place in the Act of 1946 where that phrase occurs, and that, if the conditions precedent to bringing s. 5 into operation do not exist, they cannot arise under s. 11. And then it was said that s. 11 is an amending section, and that an amendment should not be held to make a fundamental or far reaching change if adequate effect can be given to the words of the amendment without producing that result. These arguments might have great weight if s. 11 could be read as only conferring some additional protection in cases where a limited protection had already been given by s. 5, but I find it impossible so to read s. 11. Section 11 appears to me to apply to some cases which are wholly outside the scope of s. 5. Section 5 is expressly limited to cases where the reference to the tribunal has been made by the lessee or the local authority, whereas there is no such limitation expressed in s. 11. Section 11 could not have been drafted without the terms of s. 5 being prominently in view, and the failure to repeat the limitation to cases where the reference was by the lessee or the local authority must have been deliberate. So s. 11 must be held to apply to cases where the reference to the tribunal was by the lessor and no proceedings had been initiated by the lessee or local authority before the notice to quit; and s. 11 must, therefore, have a wider object than merely to afford some defence against retaliation by the lessor if the lessee or local authority invokes the statutory procedure. Then the words "by virtue of the contract" within the brackets near the beginning of s. 11 (1) do not consist well with the respondent's argument. As I have already said, they apply, and can only apply, to cases where s. 5 has not applied to extend the period of notice: if s. 5 had applied, the notice would take effect by virtue of the Act of 1946. On the respondent's argument, the words "by virtue of the contract" have an exceedingly limited application. The respondent does not argue that s. 11 only applies when s. 5 has already applied to the case: that would deny all force to these words. The argument is that s. 11 only applies if the notice to quit was given within the period mentioned in s. 5, and on that view there might be a case where the lessor gave notice shortly before the expiry of the three months, but the notice was not due to take effect until after the end of the three months, and the words "by virtue of the contract" would then apply. But the wording of s. 11 does not suggest so limited an application. And another difficulty emerges, if I am right in thinking that s. 11 applies to cases where the original reference was by the lessor: s. 5 has no application to them and it is not easy to see why the period mentioned in s. 5 should be imported into s. 11 so as to affect them.

I find no similar difficulties involved in the interpretation for which the appellants contend. Section 11 is not dependent on s. 5 and, once the three initial conditions in s. 11 are satisfied, any lessee on whom a notice to quit is served can apply to the tribunal, whatever be the interval between the original decision of the tribunal and the service of the notice. So far as I can see the

- A only substantial objection to this interpretation is that it gives rise to serious anomalies in the practical application of the Act, but the respondent's interpretation gives rise to others hardly less substantial, and anomalies are inevitable under a scheme which gives nothing to tenants whose contracts have not been referred to a tribunal, but may give to others, although their application to the tribunal has been unsuccessful, a right to remain in possession for as long
- B as the tribunal will allow, there being no direction or guidance to tribunals how or on what principles they are to exercise this novel jurisdiction. Accordingly, I do not think it right in this case to take account of considerations of a general character which might be relevant if only one of the competing interpretations produced anomalies. Simply taking the words of the Acts as they stand, I am satisfied that the appellants' interpretation is the
- C more natural and straightforward and I think that it is, therefore, to be preferred. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, this appeal turns on the meaning of the words "a notice to quit" in the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 11 (1). It is, I think, agreed by both sides, and by all the judges who have dealt with this case, that s. 11 standing by itself is unambiguous and

D in its ordinary and natural meaning would apply to a notice to quit given at any time. It is, however, contended by the respondent that the words "a notice to quit" should be given a restricted meaning, because s. 11 (5) provides:

"This section shall be construed as one with the Act of 1946, and references in this section to that Act shall be construed as references to that Act as extended by s. [7] of this Act."

- E It is said that the result of this sub-section is that "a notice to quit" must mean the notice to quit referred to in s. 5 of the Act of 1946, viz., a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given, or within three months thereafter. Section 5 of the Act of 1946 is the only section which mentions a notice to quit. This is the construction which has found favour
- F with the Divisional Court and the majority in the Court of Appeal.

The exact consequence of a provision that one Act is to be construed as one with another, beyond incorporating the definitions contained in the first Act, is not altogether easy to ascertain, because it would seem that, if both Acts are dealing with the same subject-matter, it would in any event in a case of ambiguity be necessary to construe the second Act in the light of the

G provisions of the first. In the present case, having regard to s. 8 of the Act of 1946, which gives power to make procedural regulations, it would seem that, in order to make it clear that such regulations apply to applications under s. 11 of the Act of 1949, some such provision as that contained in sub-s. (5) was desirable. I am, however, prepared to accept the respondent's contention that one result of sub-s. (5) is that s. 11 should be construed as if it were

H inserted immediately after s. 5 in the Act of 1946 and I, therefore, approach its construction on that footing. It would have been a most remarkable piece of draftsmanship if s. 11 of the Act of 1949 in its present form had been inserted immediately after s. 5 in the Act of 1946 with the intention of producing the result contended for by the respondent. The opening words of s. 11 (1) are:

"Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal under that Act", not—be it observed—under s. 5 of that Act but “under that Act”. If s. 11 followed s. 5 and the draftsman had intended in s. 11 to include only references under s. 5, he would have said “has been referred to a tribunal under the preceding section”, and to achieve the same result in a subsequent Act he would have said “has been referred to a tribunal under s. 5 of the Act of 1946”. It seems to me, therefore, clear that at the outset s. 11 is dealing with references which are not limited to references made under s. 5 of the Act of 1946, but must include references by the lessor under the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1946. This view is, I think, strengthened by the fact that s. 11 (5) of the Act of 1949 requires that s. 11 shall be construed as “one with the Act of 1946”, not as one with s. 5 of that Act.

Proceeding, therefore, on the basis that, at the outset, the subject-matter of s. 11 extends beyond the subject-matter of s. 5, I cannot understand what rule of construction can limit the later words “a notice to quit” to the particular kind of notice referred to in s. 5. If this had been intended the draftsman would surely have said “a notice to quit served within the period referred to in the preceding section”, or would have repeated the language of that section, or in a later Act would have said “a notice to quit served within the period referred to in s. 5 of the Act of 1946”, or, more probably, would have repeated the language of the former section. Instead of this, we find the general words “a notice to quit” used in contrast to the restricted kind of notice which has been dealt with in the section which, for present purposes, we are considering as if it had preceded s. 11. The fact that in s. 11 the words “the premises to which the contract relates” have not been repeated, although the notice referred to must necessarily be a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates, is not sufficient to persuade me that “a notice to quit” is merely an abbreviated reference to the notice referred to in s. 5, being a notice served within the limits of time therein prescribed. The opening words of s. 11 (1): “Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred”, make it clear that the notice to quit must be a notice to quit the premises to which such contract relates, though it would, no doubt, have been tidier to repeat the words which had been used in s. 5.

In the result, I can find no justification for restricting the ordinary meaning of the language of s. 11, especially in view of the fact that the section is admittedly designed to extend the security of tenure afforded by s. 5. The limits of that extension must, I think, be ascertained from the ordinary meaning of the language used, read in conjunction with the Act of 1946, including s. 5, and so read do not necessarily impose the limits contended for by the respondent.

My Lords, I have endeavoured to explain in my own words my reasons for differing from the construction placed on this section by five of the six judges in the courts below, but I am conscious that I have added little, if anything, to the detailed analysis of these sections by JENKINS, L.J., and I would only add that I can find nothing in the other judgments, nor have I heard anything in the course of argument before your Lordships, which demonstrates any flaw or fallacy in the process of reasoning by which he arrived at the conclusion that the applicant for the order of certiorari had failed to establish a lack of jurisdiction in the tribunal. I would, accordingly, allow the appeal.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: My Lords, I had prepared an opinion in this case, but shortly afterwards I had the advantage of reading that of my noble and learned friend, LORD REID, and I found myself in such complete agreement with it, that I thought, and think, it would serve no purpose to add an independent opinion of my own. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

LATIMER v. A.E.C., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), April 27, 28, 29, 30, June 25, 1953.]

Factory—Floor—Maintenance—Floor slippery from flood water and oil—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 25 (1), s. 152 (1).

- A Safe System of Working—Factory flooded in exceptional storm—Water mixed with oil—Floor rendered dangerously slippery—No want of care by occupiers—Accident through workman slipping—Liability of occupiers.

Owing to an exceptionally heavy storm of rain, a factory was flooded with surface water which became mixed with an oily liquid used as a cooling agent for the machines which was normally collected in channels in the floor. When the water drained away from the floor, which was level and structurally perfect, it left an oily film on the surface which was slippery. The respondents spread sawdust on the floor, but owing to the unprecedented force of the storm and the consequently large area to be covered, there was insufficient sawdust to cover the whole floor. In the course of his duty the appellant slipped on a portion of the floor not covered with sawdust, fell, and was injured.

C HELD: (i) "properly maintained" in s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, read with the definition of "maintained" in s. 152 (1), referred to the general condition and soundness of construction of the floor and not to some transient and exceptional condition of it; a floor which was in itself of sound construction and in proper condition did not cease to be in an efficient state because there was temporarily something on it which gave rise to danger; and, therefore, the respondents were not in breach of their duty under s. 25 (1) to see that the floor was "properly maintained".

(ii) on the facts the respondents had taken every step which an ordinarily prudent employer would have taken in the circumstances to secure the safety of the appellant, and so they were not liable to the appellant for negligence at common law.

The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the learned judge that there had been no breach of statutory duty by the respondents, but reversed his decision on the point of negligence at common law.

June 25. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, in this case the appellant recovered a sum of £550 as damages for injuries which he alleged had been the result of a failure on the part of the respondents in breach of their statutory duty to maintain one of the gangways in their works in an efficient state. He relied also on an allegation of common law negligence. PILCHER, J., rejected his claim based on a breach of statutory duty, but held the respondents guilty of common law negligence. The Court of Appeal agreed with the judgment of the learned judge on the claim for breach of statutory duty, but were of opinion that there was no common law negligence on the part of the respondents. A

The relevant facts are short and undisputed. The appellant was a horizontal milling machine operator employed by the respondents in their works at Southall. At those works they employ some four thousand persons and the works themselves extend over an area of about fifteen acres. On Aug. 31, 1950, the appellant was working on the night shift in the general machine room and came on duty at about 7.45 p.m. His work involved collecting barrels containing bundles of hand brake levers and weighing about two hundredweights. They had to be conveyed by him on a trolley along a passage or gangway for a distance of about thirty yards from the place where they were stored. Between about 12 noon and 3 p.m. on that afternoon there had been an exceptionally heavy storm of rain which caused the whole of the premises to become flooded with surface water. This water became mixed with an oily liquid known as "mystic" which was normally collected in channels in the floor of the building. These channels were covered with iron lids which were not watertight. The "mystic" was soluble in water and was used to act as a cooling agent for the machines. B C D E F G H
When the water which had so been impregnated drained away from the floor it left an oily film on the surface which was slippery. After the rainfall had subsided, the respondents spread sawdust on the floor so far as they had a sufficient quantity for that purpose. They had, in fact, enough at hand for any occurrence which they could be expected to foresee, but, owing to the unprecedented force of the storm in question and the large area that had to be covered, there was insufficient sawdust to place it on portions of the floor, including the part of the floor where the barrels were situated. The principal object of spreading sawdust on the floor was to dry it, but, incidentally, it would also have some effect in decreasing the slipperiness. The respondents knew that the coating of the floor with the mixture of "mystic" and water would, to some extent, increase its slipperiness. They also knew that the appellant in the course of his work would have to collect the barrels at the place in question. At about 8.45 p.m., in the course of his work, he went to collect a barrel with the help of a fellow workman and succeeded in getting the metal lip of a trolley under the base of the barrel in order to raise it from the floor. He then placed his right foot on the axle of the trolley and pushed with his left foot, but his left foot slipped on the oily surface of the floor, with the result that he fell on his back and the barrel rolled off the trolley and crushed his left ankle. Undoubtedly, the respondents did their best to get rid of the effects of the flood, employing such of the day workers as could be spared, and obtaining volunteers from them for work in the interval between day and night work and from the night shift at a later period, but, in the learned judge's opinion, it was not possible for them to take any further steps to make the floor less slippery. I understand his view to have been, however, that, inasmuch as the effect of the storm left the gangway in question, and possibly other portions of the works, somewhat slippery, and, therefore, potentially dangerous, they should have shut down the whole works if necessary, or, at any rate, such portion as was dangerous.

My Lords, the difficulty which I feel about this solution is that neither the necessity for such an action nor its effect was ever pleaded, explored or considered until the respondents' counsel was in the course of making his final speech. No doubt, the point was then raised and argued on behalf of the respondents. It may, indeed, be that an adjournment could have been asked for at that stage and evidence called on either side. But to take such action would have meant re-casting the whole framework of the case, and I do not think it was incumbent on the respondents' representatives to take this course.

- A In my opinion, they were entitled to rest on the evidence as given, and to ask that it should be considered as a whole and the requisite inference drawn from it. It was urged that the mere happening of such an accident cast the onus on them of explaining it and excusing themselves, but the facts material to the matters pleaded had been given in evidence and where the relevant facts have been established no question of onus arises. A number of complaints of negligence and breach of duty are set out in the statement of claim, but so far as common law negligence is concerned I can find no suggestion that the factory should have been closed, nor was any amendment asked for, or permitted, to that effect. All the particulars set out in the statement of claim consisted of complaints which the learned judge found not to have been established and which were not persisted in before your Lordships. On the
- C issue of common law negligence, as now presented, the direction which should be given is not in doubt. It is to determine what action, in the circumstances which have been proved, would a reasonably prudent man have taken. The probability of a workman slipping is one matter which must be borne in mind, but it must be remembered that no one else did so. Nor does the possibility seem to have occurred to anyone at the time. It is true that after the event
- D Mr. Milne, one of the respondents' witnesses, expressed the opinion that he would not have gone on to the floor in the condition in which it was and that it would be too dangerous to do so. But this was after the event, and, though he was the respondents' safety engineer and was present until late that night, it seems never to have occurred to him that there was any danger or that any further steps than those actually taken were possible, or required for the safety
- E of the employees. The seriousness of shutting down the works and sending the night shift home and the importance of carrying on the work on which the factory was engaged are all additional elements for consideration, and without adequate information on these matters it is impossible to express any final opinion. Moreover, owing to the course taken at the trial, there is no material
- F for enabling one to judge whether a partial closing of the factory was possible, or the extent to which the cessation of the appellant's activities would have retarded the whole of the work being carried on. In my view, in these circumstances, the appellant has not established that a reasonably careful employer would have shut down the works, or that the respondents ought to have taken the drastic step of closing the factory.

- G The question whether there has been a breach of statutory duty turns on the true construction of s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. That sub-section provides that

"All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained" and s. 152 (1) defines "maintained" as meaning

- H "maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

Section 25 (1), were it not for the definition, would seem merely to provide for sound construction and a proper state of repair. But the definition does give rise to a more difficult problem, inasmuch as it requires both the existence of "good repair" and an "efficient state". The further provision as to "efficient working order" may be neglected since that requisite is more appropriate to working machines than to a static portion of the premises. It has still, however, to be determined what it is which has to be in an efficient state. Does it include the elimination of some matter which is temporarily superimposed on the floor, or is the requirement confined to the floor itself? To be efficient, the appellant contended, the floor must be fit for any of the purposes for which it is intended, e.g., for support and for passing over in safety. The difficulty of such a view is that it puts an excessive obligation on the employer. Indeed, it was conceded that it could not be carried to the length of saying that a temporary obstruction, such as a piece of orange peel or the like, would make it inefficient. Once this concession is made it becomes a question of the degree of temporary inefficiency which constitutes a breach of the employer's obligation.

Primarily, in my opinion, the section is aimed at some general condition of the gangway, e.g., a dangerously polished surface, or the like, or possibly some permanent fitment which makes it unsafe. But I cannot think the provision was meant to, or does, apply to a transient and exceptional condition. If it had been directed to such a state of affairs it would have been easy to say so. Indeed, in s. 34 (2) the kind of language appropriate to such an object is to be found where there is provision that "all means of escape . . . shall be properly maintained and kept free from obstruction". Perhaps the best illustration of the extent of the obligation which has reached your Lordships' House is to be found in Galashiels Gas Co., Ltd. v. O'Donnell or Millar (1), where the grips which ought to have held a lift in place at one of the floors for some unaccountable and unascertainable reason failed to act, with the result that one of the workmen fell down the shaft and was injured. No blame could be attached to the employers, yet, as the duty was absolute, your Lordships held them liable. The decision was given on the very section now under discussion and was much relied on by the appellant. That case, however, differs from the facts of the present case in that the lift itself was out of order, and no temporary superincumbent danger had been added to it. It is no authority, therefore, for holding the respondents liable in the present case. It may be added as an additional factor that the obligation is a penal one, that the phraseology is at least ambiguous, and, although it has to be remembered that the Act is intended for the protection of workmen, and to that extent should receive a benevolent construction, yet employers are not lightly to be made criminals unless a clear direction of an Act of Parliament has that effect. I agree with the Court of Appeal that this point fails and that there was no negligence at common law. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree. On the question of common law negligence I have come to the conclusion, though not without doubt, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. What is negligence is, in my opinion, a question of fact to be decided by the tribunal of fact. In the present case, although PILCHER, J., who tried the case, did not, in terms, say that he was applying the standard of care which an ordinarily prudent employer would have taken in all the circumstances, there is, in my view, no doubt that he intended to apply that standard. If he did, and if there was admissible evidence on which he might base his finding, that finding ought only to be set aside where it is clear that he was wrong. There was such evidence in the present case since the respondents themselves proved that the flooding of their factory was unprecedented: that, owing to their system of partially open mystic drains, oil in such circumstances would, and did, escape over the factory floor: that in view of this state of affairs they put forty men on specially to lay down all the sawdust they had on the floors and passages: that they kept twenty-four volunteers on to continue the work of cleaning the floors and passages, but that they did not stop the work of the factory but allowed the night shift to come on duty. Now, although it is true that no questions were put in cross-examination to the respondents' witnesses suggesting that they ought to have closed the factory, the point was raised by the judge during the argument and no application was made for an adjournment, or for an amendment of the pleadings. The facts, indeed, were admitted, and the principal question on the issue of common law negligence was whether such facts amounted to negligence. It does not seem to me that, if a jury had found in such circumstances that the respondents had been negligent, the Court of Appeal could properly have set aside their verdict. But, no doubt, a judge's finding is not entitled to the same finality, and I think, on the whole, that, since the evidence as to the condition of the floors and passages at the time the night shift came on was very meagre and that practically the only evidence of their slippery condition was the accident to the appellant, I come to the conclusion that the conduct of the respondents can, at the highest, be said to have been an error of judgment in circumstances of difficulty and such an error of judgment does not, in my opinion, amount to negligence.

On the question of the construction of s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, I am of opinion that, by virtue of that sub-section and the interpretation section, s. 152 (1), the respondents were bound to maintain the floors and passages in an efficient state, but I do not consider that it was proved that they were not in an efficient state. A floor does not, in my opinion, cease to be in an efficient state because a piece of orange peel, or a small pool of some slippery material, is on it. While I do not agree that the maintenance of the floors is confined to their construction, I think the obligation to maintain them in an efficient state introduces into what is an absolute duty a question of degree as to what is efficient. I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD REID: My Lords, a film of oil had been deposited by flood water on the floor of the respondents' factory. At a place where sawdust had not yet been applied to it the appellant, without realising the danger, tried to get a heavy barrel on to a trolley. He was standing on one foot and using considerable force with the other when he slipped and received severe injuries. His case is that his injuries were caused by a breach by the respondents of s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. That sub-section provides:

"All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained".

It is not alleged that the floor was not of sound construction, but it is said that, by reason of the presence of the oil which was a source of danger, the floor was not at the time of the accident properly maintained. It seems to me that the first question is whether the film of oil can be regarded as a part of the floor. There may be difficult cases where something has been put on a floor without being incorporated with it and where it could be regarded as part of the floor, but this is not one of those cases. The oil was on the floor casually and temporarily, and seems to me to have been no more part of the floor than a banana skin dropped by a passer-by. The question, then, is whether s. 25 (1) applies to things which are not part of the floor, but whose presence on it is a source of danger. If s. 25 stood alone, I would say that it did not. No doubt the section is one dealing with safety, but, even so, keeping the surface of a floor free from dangerous material does not appear to me to come within the scope of maintaining the floor.

The difficulty in the case arises from the definition of the word "maintained" in s. 152 (1). That sub-section provides:

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them respectively, that is to say: . . . 'Maintained' means maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

The word "maintained" occurs in many sections, often in connection with machinery. The whole definition can then be applied without difficulty. But, unless "working order" is used in a very loose way, which one does not expect in an Act of Parliament, to ask whether a floor is in efficient working order is to ask a meaningless question. It was not disputed that this part of the definition cannot be read into s. 25 (1), and it was argued that, because the context excludes this part of the definition, it excludes the whole of the definition. I do not see why it should. I think that each part of the definition is severable. The phrase "in good repair" is clearly applicable to a floor, but this floor did not cease to be in good repair by reason of the presence of the oil on its surface. The difficulty arises with regard to the phrase "in an efficient state". "Efficient" is an awkward word to use in connection with a floor, but I cannot reject it as meaningless. The appellant argues that a floor cannot be in an efficient state if people are liable to slip on it, but, again, I think one must ask whether the danger comes from the floor or from something which happens to be on it. It would be going a long way to say that a floor, perfectly good in itself, ceases to be in an efficient state whenever there is something on it which gives rise to danger. If there is any ambiguity, one is entitled to look at the consequences of adopting each of the possible interpretations. It is one thing to say that an employer is absolutely responsible for the condition of his floors, even if the unsafe condition has come about through no fault of his or his servants, and could not have been remedied before the accident, but I would expect clearer words if it were intended that he should also be held responsible if something dangerous got on his floor and made it for the time being "inefficient" through some inevitable accident or the fault of some other person not his servant. But I do not think that there is really any ambiguity here. The requirement of the definition is not that the floor shall be in an efficient state: it is that the floor shall be maintained in an efficient state. "Maintained" is the dominant word throughout and that throws one back to what is meant by maintaining a floor. I see little difference between maintaining a floor "properly" as required by s. 25 (1) and maintaining it "in an efficient state" as required by the definition. I have already said that I do not think that maintaining a floor includes keeping dangerous things away from it. To prevent misunderstanding, I ought, perhaps, to add that maintaining a machine in efficient working order does, I think, involve preventing foreign matter from reaching any place where it can interfere with the proper working of the machine, and for that reason I cannot get much assistance in this case from Galashiels Gas Co., Ltd. v. O'Donnell or Millar (1).

The appellant also alleges breach of the respondents' duty to him at common law. On that part of the case I agree entirely with the speech which my noble and learned friend, LORD TUCKER, is about to deliver and which I have had an opportunity of reading. I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, as to the proper construction of s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, in the light of the definition of the word "maintained" in s. 152 (1) of that Act, I am in agreement with the conclusion reached by the trial judge, the members of the Court of Appeal and your Lordships, that it has not the wide meaning contended for by the appellant so as to render the respondents liable for the condition of the floor of this factory in the circumstances existing on Aug. 31, 1950, and I do not desire to add anything on this part of the case.

With regard to the alleged breach by the respondents of their common law duty to take reasonable care for the safety of their servants, I am in complete agreement with what was said by SINGLETON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in his application of the standard required to the facts as found by the trial judge. I only venture to add a few observations out of respect for the careful judgment of PULCHER, J., and because it appears to me desirable in these days, when there are in existence so many statutes and statutory regulations imposing absolute obligations on employers, that the courts should be vigilant to see that the common law duty owed by a master to his servants should not be gradually enlarged until it is barely distinguishable from his absolute statutory obligations.

A In the present case, the respondents were faced with an unprecedented situation following a phenomenal rain storm. They set forty men to work on cleaning up the factory when the flood subsided and used all the available supply of sawdust, which was approximately three tons. The judge has found that they took every step which could reasonably have been taken to deal with the conditions which prevailed before the night shift came on duty, and
B he has negatived every specific allegation of negligence as pleaded, but he has held the respondents liable because they did not close down the factory, or the part of the factory where the accident occurred, before the commencement of the night shift. I do not question that such a drastic step may be required on the part of a reasonably prudent employer if the peril to his employees is sufficiently grave, and to this extent it must always be a question of degree,
C but, in my view, there was no evidence in the present case which could justify a finding of negligence for failure on the part of the respondents to take this step. This question was never canvassed in evidence, nor was sufficient evidence given as to the condition of the factory as a whole to enable a satisfactory conclusion to be reached. The learned judge seems to have accepted the reasoning of counsel for the appellant to the effect that the floor was slippery,
D that slipperiness is a potential danger, that the respondents must be taken to have been aware of this, that in the circumstances nothing could have been done to remedy the slipperiness, that the respondents allowed work to proceed, that an accident due to slipperiness occurred, and that the respondents are, therefore, liable.

E This is not the correct approach. The problem is perfectly simple. The only question was: Has it been proved that the floor was so slippery that, remedial steps not being possible, a reasonably prudent employer would have closed down the factory rather than allow his employees to run the risks involved in continuing work? The learned judge does not seem to me to have posed this question to himself, nor was there sufficient evidence before him to have justified an affirmative answer. The absence of any evidence that anyone in F the factory during the afternoon or night shift, other than the appellant, slipped, or experienced any difficulty, or that any complaint was made by or on behalf of the workers, all points to the conclusion that the danger was, in fact, not such as to impose on a reasonable employer the obligation placed on the respondents by the trial judge. I agree that the appeal be dismissed.

G LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: My Lords, this appeal raises two points: (A) Are the defendants liable under the Factories Act, 1937? (B) Are they liable at common law for negligence? Of these, the first point presents the greater difficulties.

(A) The question is what the words "properly maintained", in s. 25 (1), mean. The sub-section provides that the "floors", inter alia, "shall be of H sound construction and properly maintained". If these words stood alone and there were no definition of the word "maintain" in the statute, for myself, I should be in little doubt as to their interpretation. I should take them to mean that, at the time of its construction or installation, the floor should possess the structural qualities which a floor ought to possess, e.g., a level surface and sufficient strength to bear the stresses to which it is liable to be subjected, and that from that time on the owner of the factory should keep up, prolong or perpetuate that structural condition. But the fact cannot be ignored that there is a definition of "maintain" in s. 152 (1), and that this definition, in part or in whole, must be read into s. 25 (1). There are three limbs in the definition. "Maintained" means "maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair". This definition is capable of more than one construction. (i) Counsel for the respondents, in an attractive argument, contended that the three limbs of the definition should be read selectively or distributively, viz., that, according to the subject-matter involved, all three limbs might apply, or some two of them, or only one. Thus, in the case of a machine (e.g., a lift), there is no difficulty in applying all three. In the case, however, of a wholly and permanently passive entity, such as a floor, he argued (and I think this was common ground) that "efficient working order" was inapplicable, and, going further, that "efficient state" was also inapposite, since "efficiency" connotes at the least potential activity or mobility, which a floor does not possess. Ergo, the words "in good repair" alone applied, and these words were fully satisfied by adequate repair of the structure. (ii) The respondents also argued that, short of this, the words "of sound construction" in s. 25 (1) ran through, and coloured, both the words "properly maintained" and the definition of "maintained". The second "reason" in the respondents' case formulates this contention as follows:

"Because the definition of the word 'maintained' in s. 152 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, means, in relation to s. 25 (1), that it is the sound construction which has to be maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair."

This argument accepts the applicability of all three limbs of the definition, but treats their scope as controlled and narrowed throughout by the words "of sound construction" at the opening of the substantive sub-section. (iii) Or again, s. 25 (1), plus the definition, may be read as imposing two independent and cumulative obligations: (a) to maintain the soundness of the floor's structure; (b) to maintain the floor in an efficient state, not in respect of its structure only, but over some wider range of qualities, which might include what has been called a "non-skid" quality in the surface.

It is somewhat tempting to solve these difficulties of construction by contenting oneself with the comparatively simple test on which DENNING, L.J.'s judgment mainly proceeds. He treats the duty of maintaining the soundness of the floor qua floor as absolute, but distinguishes between the floor itself and things, whether solid or liquid, superimposed on it, in respect of whose presence no absolute duty, in his view, exists but only a duty of reasonable care. You must maintain the floor, but it does not cease to be maintained because cumbered with things resting on it. I do not dissent from this view, but it may be difficult to apply in practice in border-line cases. Where, e.g., a floor has polish so rubbed into it as to become absorbed and incorporated in its structure, are we dealing with a floor simpliciter or a floor plus something superincumbent on it? On the whole, I consider that the second of the three constructions outlined above is the most satisfactory, viz., that the words "of sound construction" control, colour, or canalise the whole of s. 25 (1) and the definition. The unreported decision of HILBERY, J., in Pitfield v. Railway Executive (2) proceeds on this basis, and I can see nothing in the Galashiels case (1) (which proceeded on s. 22 (1), a section with a different wording, and applied to a different subject-matter—a mobile object and a machine) which is inconsistent with it. On the point of construction, therefore, I am of opinion that the respondents succeed.

(B) Negligence at common law. At common law the question can only be whether, having regard to the nature and extent of the risk created by the slippery patches on the floor, a reasonably careful employer would have suspended all work in this fifteen acre factory and sent the night shift home or, whether, having done all he could (and did) do with the sawdust at his disposal,

A the forty production service men in the afternoon, and the twenty-four volunteers between the end of the day shift and the beginning of the night shift, he would have allowed the work to proceed. The learned trial judge concluded that a reasonable employer would have closed down. I agree with practically everything else he said in a most careful judgment. But, of course, this conclusion was crucial. In considering it, one cannot but be impressed by the following considerations: (a) It was nowhere specifically pleaded in the statement of claim that the works should have been closed down; (b) no witness for the appellant suggested that this should have been done; (c) no question was put to any witness for the defence to that effect; (d) no evidence was directed to the question, which on this issue was fundamental, what degree of dislocation or complication a complete stoppage would have entailed; (e) the point was first taken, after the evidence was closed, by the learned judge himself during B the final speech of one of the counsel. In these circumstances I agree with the observations of SINGLETON, L.J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1304):

C "If the test is, as I believe, what a reasonable employer would have done in those circumstances, I fail to see that there is any breach by the employers of the duty which they owed, and I fail to see, too, any evidence on which a finding that the employers were negligent in not closing the factory can be based."

D What evidence the learned judge had before him suggests, to my mind, that the degree of risk was too small to justify, let alone require, closing down. The evidence of the appellant himself is that "you always get a certain amount of grease about". Ampstead, his fellow worker, says exactly the same, adding E that on "numerous occasions" (four or five times) he had seen "mystic" well up from the channels in the floor of the factory owing to flooding. Yet the appellant says that, except for the accident to himself on this occasion in August, 1950, he has never known any accident happen to any one in the factory through these causes. I cannot resist the conclusion that on this occasion, notwithstanding the extent of the flooding, the risk was inconsiderable, and E that the learned judge's conclusion cannot stand. Treated as a finding of fact, it cannot be supported on the evidence, which, as to the onerousness of the suggested remedial measure, was non-existent. Treated as an inference of fact, it was open to the Court of Appeal and is open to your Lordship's House to draw a different inference, and I would do so. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

MAURAY v. DURLEY CHINE (INVESTMENTS), LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 20, 21, 22, June 17, 1953.]

Rent Control—Excessive rent—Requirement to pay—Rent under lease reduced—Option by deed to renew lease at original rent—Validity of option—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 4 (1) (a).

By a lease dated Dec. 14, 1946, the landlords let to the tenant a furnished flat for seven years from June 24, 1946, at the yearly rent of £525. By a deed dated Mar. 30, 1949, the tenant was given the option of taking a new lease of the flat for a term of seven years from June 24, 1953, at the same rent. In January, 1950, on the tenant's application, a rent tribunal set up under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 1 (2), reduced the rent of the flat to £425, and that reduced rent was duly entered in the register kept under s. 3 (1) and (2) of the Act. On Dec. 6, 1951, the tenant purported to exercise the option by requesting the landlords to grant him a renewed lease of the premises for a further seven years "from June 24, 1953, at the yearly rent of £525 (reduced to £425 for the duration of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, by the decision of the rent tribunal . . .)." The landlords refused to grant him a new lease. On a claim by the tenant for a declaration that the option was valid and subsisting and had been duly exercised by him,

HELD: (i) the notice given by the tenant required the landlords to grant a lease commencing on a date (viz., June 24, 1953) later than that then fixed for the expiration of the Act of 1946 (viz., Mar. 31, 1953); the mere granting of such a lease at the rent of £525 did not amount to a "requiring" of that rent contrary to s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act so as to constitute an offence under s. 9 (1), nor was the agreement to grant such a lease impossible of performance by reason of illegality; and, therefore, the tenant was entitled to the grant of the lease.

(ii) the words contained in the tenant's notice "at the yearly rent of £525 (reduced to £425 for the duration of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 . . .)" did not call for a lease in terms different from those of the lease specified by the option agreement, but were merely declaratory of the legal effect of granting a lease in the terms offered by that agreement, and, therefore, the plaintiff's notice was a good and valid notice.

Decision of GERRARD, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 712), affirmed.

AS TO OPTION TO RENEW LEASES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, p. 68, para. 74.

FOR THE FURNISHED HOUSES (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1946, s. 4 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 1088.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of GERRARD, J., dated Feb. 24, 1953, and reported [1953] 1 All E.R. 712.

The tenant claimed a declaration that the option contained in a deed dated Mar. 30, 1949, to take a new lease of a flat at a rent of £525 per annum was valid and subsisting and had been duly exercised by him, notwithstanding that the rent of the flat had been reduced by a rent tribunal from £525 to £425. GERRARD, J., granted the plaintiff the declaration, and held (i) that under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2 (3), where a rent had been entered in the register kept under s. 3 (1) of the Act either party to the contract could refer the case to the tribunal for the re-consideration of the rent on the ground of change of circumstances, and so, when the new lease took effect, the rent entered in the register might have been amended to £525 or even more, and so the court could not assume that the renewal of the lease at a rent of £525 would be illegal. He held further that the effect of mere covenant to pay a rent in excess of the rent entered in the register did not amount to a "requiring" of the payment of that excessive rent within s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1946, and, therefore, the granting of a new lease at a rent of £525 would not be unlawful under that sub-section.

Cur. adv. vult.

JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. By a lease dated Dec. 14, 1946, and made between the defendants, Durley Chine (Investments), Ltd. (who are the present appellants), of the one part, and the plaintiff, Maurice Mauray (who is the present respondent), of the other part, the defendants demised to the plaintiff flat No. C.1 in a building known as Durley Chine Court, Bournemouth, for the term of seven years from June 24, 1946, at the yearly rent of £525 payable quarterly in advance, with a provision for the payment by the plaintiff as an additional rent of such further amount as the defendants might be called on to pay for general rate, poor rate and water rate, or any of them, in respect of the flat over and above the amount payable at the date of the commencement of the said term. The covenants on the part of the defendants as lessors included a covenant to pay all rates and taxes in respect of the flat except for gas and electricity used in it, and also included covenants to provide certain services for the benefit of the plaintiff as tenant of the flat. The defendants' covenants in regard to the provision of services admittedly had the effect of bringing the letting within the purview of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. In order to appreciate the questions involved in the appeal, it is necessary to refer to some of the provisions of that Act.

Section 1 (1) provides for the application of the Act to any district by order of the Ministry of Health on representation by or after consultation with the local authority concerned. It is not in dispute that at all times material to the present appeal the Act has been applicable in the district in which Durley Chine Court is situate. Section 1 (2) provides for the setting up of a tribunal constituted as therein mentioned for each district in which the Act is in force. Section 2 (so far as material for the present purpose) provides as follows:

"(1) Where a contract has, whether before or after the passing of this Act, been entered into whereby one person (hereinafter referred to as the 'lessor') grants to another person (hereinafter referred to as the 'lessee') the right to occupy as a residence a house or part of a house situated in a district in which this Act is in force in consideration of a rent which includes payment for the use of furniture or for services . . . it shall be lawful for either party to the contract or for the local authority to refer the contract to the tribunal for the district, and where any such contract (hereinafter referred to as 'a contract to which this Act applies') is so referred to the tribunal, they may by a notice in writing served on the lessor require him to give to them, within such period (which shall not be less than seven days from the date of the service of the notice) as may be specified in the notice, such information as they may reasonably require regarding such of the prescribed particulars relating to the contract as are specified in the notice. (2) Where any contract to which this Act applies is referred to a tribunal, then, unless at any time before the tribunal have entered upon consideration of the reference it is withdrawn by the person or authority by whom it was made, the tribunal shall consider it and, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party . . . an opportunity of being heard, or, in his option, of submitting representations in writing, shall approve the rent payable under the contract or reduce it to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision in each case. (3) Where the rent payable for any premises has been entered in the register in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change of circumstances, and the provisions of sub-s. (2) of this section shall apply on any such reference in like manner as they apply on a reference under sub-s. (1) of this section subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power to increase the rent payable."

Section 3 and s. 4 are in these terms:

"3. (1) The local authority shall prepare and keep up to date a register for the purposes of this Act, and shall make the register available for inspection in such place or places and in such manner as the Minister may direct. (2) The register shall be so prepared and kept up to date as to contain, with regard to any contract under which a rent is payable that has been approved, reduced or increased under the last foregoing section (being a contract relating to premises situated in the area of the local authority), entries of (a) the prescribed particulars with regard to the contract; (b) a specification of the premises to which the contract relates; and (c) the rent as approved, reduced or increased by the tribunal, and, in a case in which the approval, reduction or increase is limited to rent payable in respect of a particular period, a specification of that period. (3) It shall be the duty of the tribunal, when they notify, under sub-s. (2) of the last foregoing section, the local authority of their decision in a case, to furnish to the local authority such particulars as are requisite for enabling them to discharge their functions under the foregoing provisions of this section. 4. (1) Where the rent payable for any premises is entered in the register under the provisions of this Act, it shall not be lawful to require or receive—(a) on account of rent for those premises in respect of any period subsequent to the date of such entry, (or, in a case in which a particular period is specified, in respect of that period) payment of any sum in excess of the rent so entered . . . (2) Where any payment or consideration has been made or received in contravention of the foregoing sub-section, the amount or value thereof shall be recoverable by the person by whom it was made or given."

Section 9 (1) provides:

"A person who requires or receives any payment or any consideration in contravention of s. 4 of this Act shall be guilty of an offence and be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £100 or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months or to both such fine and such imprisonment, and, without prejudice to any other method of recovery, the court by which he is found guilty may order the amount paid or the value of the consideration given to be repaid to the person by whom the payment was made or the consideration given."

Section 13 provides that the Act (which came into force on Mar. 26, 1946) should continue in force until Dec. 31, 1947, but it has been from time to time continued. The two latest continuations have been those affected by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, 1951 (to Mar. 31, 1953), and by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, 1952 (to Mar. 31, 1954).

A dispute arose between the parties concerning the provision in the lease for the payment as additional rent of the amount of any increase in the rates payable by the defendants as therein mentioned. This dispute led to an action in the Chancery Division in which the defendants were plaintiffs and the plaintiff was defendant. The action was compromised on terms which included the giving by the present defendants to the present plaintiff of the option contained in the next-mentioned agreement.

By an agreement under seal dated Mar. 30, 1949, and made between the defendants of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, after a recital to the effect that the terms of settlement of the Chancery action included the granting by the defendants to the plaintiff of the option thereafter contained, it was witnessed (so far as material for the present purpose) as follows:

"1. In pursuance of the said term of settlement and in consideration of the premises the lessee shall have the option of taking a lease of the several rooms bathrooms and servants' offices known as flat No. C.1 on the second floor of the building known as Durley Chine Court Bournemouth in the county of Hants for a term of seven years from June 24, 1953, at the yearly rent of £525 such lease to be in the form of the existing lease of the said premises dated Dec. 14, 1946 and made between the lessors of the one part and the lessee of the other part except that there shall be substituted in cl. 1 for the words 'at the date of the commencement of the said term' the words 'on June 24, 1946.' . . . 4. The said option shall be exercisable by notice in writing to the lessors at any time before or on June 24, 1952, and if and when the same shall be exercised then the lessors shall forthwith grant and the tenant shall accept a lease of the said flat on the said terms of the said premises to commence from June 24, 1953 . . . In the event of the option being exercised the lease and a counterpart thereof shall be prepared by the lessors' solicitors at the expense (including stamps) of the lessee and shall be executed by the lessors and lessee respectively."

Within a year after the execution of such agreement, the plaintiff, with a view to improving his position yet further, applied to the rent tribunal for Bournemouth and area constituted under the Act of 1946 for a reduction in the rent payable in respect of the flat. His application succeeded to the extent that on Jan. 23, 1950, the tribunal issued a notification of their decision to fix the rent of the flat at £425 per annum "for the duration of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946", but subject to the right of the defendants, or the plaintiff, or the local authority, to refer the case to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent so fixed on the ground of change of circumstances. The formal date of notification of this decision to the parties and to the local authority for registration was stated therein to be Feb. 2, 1950. The reduced rent of £425 per annum was duly entered in the register kept by the local authority pursuant to s. 3 of the Act of 1946. It thus became unlawful for the defendants to require or receive on account of rent for the flat any sum in excess of the rent of £425 per annum entered in the register (see s. 4 (1) of the Act) on pain of fine or imprisonment or both: see s. 9 (1) of the Act. Moreover, any sum received by the defendants in contravention of s. 4 (1) would be recoverable from them by the person paying it. This state of affairs would, moreover, continue for the duration of the Act of 1946, subject to the possibility of the defendants' being able to secure an increase in the registered rent on a re-consideration of it by the tribunal on the ground of change of circumstances under s. 2 (3) of the Act.

By a notice dated Dec. 4, 1951, and enclosed in a letter from his solicitors to the defendants dated Dec. 6, 1951, the plaintiff purported to exercise the option given by the agreement of Mar. 30, 1949. That notice was in these terms:

"To: Durley Chine (Investments) Ltd., 63, Coleman Street, London. I, Maurice Mauray of flat C.1, Durley Chine Court, Bournemouth, hereby give you notice that in exercise of the option in that behalf given by an agreement dated Mar. 30, 1949, and made between yourselves of the one part and myself of the other part do hereby request you to grant to me a renewed lease of the premises demised by a lease dated Dec. 14, 1946, and made between yourselves of the one part and myself of the other part for a further term of seven years from June 24, 1953, at the yearly rent of £525 (reduced to £425 for the duration of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, by the decision of the rent tribunal for Bournemouth and area notified on Feb. 2, 1950) such lease to be in the form of the said lease except that there shall be substituted in cl. 1 thereof for the words 'at the date of the commencement of the said term' the words 'on June 24, 1946,' and I agree to accept such renewed lease and do all such acts and things as under the said lease ought to be done by the lessee in relation to the grant of such lease. Dated this Dec. 4, 1951. (Signed) Maurice Mauray."

A copy of such notice was at the same time sent to the defendants' solicitors, and elicited from them this reply dated Dec. 7, 1951, addressed to the plaintiff's solicitors:

"Dear Sirs, Re flat C.1, Durley Chine Court. We are in receipt of your letter of yesterday with its enclosure. In view of what has happened since the agreement dated Mar. 30, 1949, was entered into by our clients and your client, we have been advised that the option contained in such agreement is null and void, and in the circumstances we are not able to accept the notice enclosed with your letter, and therefore return it herewith and would point out that in the absence of any new arrangement with your client, our clients will expect Mr. Mauray to vacate the premises on the expiration of his present lease."

The contention thus advanced on the defendants' behalf to the effect that in the events which had happened the option had become null and void was disputed on the plaintiff's side, and ultimately on Apr. 3, 1952, he brought the present action against the defendants alleging in para. 6 of his statement of claim delivered with the writ that

"By notice in writing dated Dec. 4, 1951, the plaintiff by his solicitors exercised the said option and requested the defendants to grant a new lease in pursuance thereof, but the defendants by a letter by their solicitors dated Dec. 7, 1951, refused to do so and contended that the said option was null and void", and claiming:

"A declaration that the option contained in the deed dated Mar. 30, 1949, is valid and subsisting and has been duly exercised by the plaintiff."

The substance of the defence delivered on behalf of the defendants is to be found in para. 4, para. 5 and para. 6, which are in these terms:

"4. The defendants admit the notice and letter referred to in para. 6 of the statement of claim but will refer thereto for the precise terms and effect thereof. No admission is made as to the validity or effect in law of the said notice as a purported exercise of the said option. 5. As a result of the said decision of the said rent tribunal made on the application of the plaintiff as hereinbefore mentioned the rent of £525 per annum which was expressly stipulated in the said deed of Mar. 30, 1949, as the rent at which the plaintiff was given the said option of taking a further lease of the said flat became under the provisions of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1949, an unlawful rent for the said flat which the defendants under penalties set forth in the said Act were prohibited from requiring or receiving. 6. In the premises the said option became null and void and the said purported exercise thereof became and is a nullity."

It will be seen that, while the defendants kept open the question whether the notice relied on by the plaintiff was, or was not, a valid and effective exercise of the option on the footing that the option itself was valid and subsisting at the time of its purported exercise, the substance of their case, as foreshadowed in their pleading, appeared to be that the Act of 1946, coupled with the tribunal's decision to reduce the rent of the flat to £425 per annum, and the registration of the rent as so reduced, had the effect of making the option void for illegality, because it thenceforth became unlawful for the defendants to grant a lease at the rent of £525 provided for in the option agreement, or, at all events, to demand or receive that rent under any lease granted pursuant to the option agreement and purporting to reserve that rent.

A The case was heard by GERRARD, J., on Feb. 24, 1953. It is clear that before him the argument for the defendants was directed exclusively to the issue of illegality. The learned judge rejected the defendants' contentions on this issue, and as it was the only issue argued before him, it necessarily followed that he held the plaintiff entitled to the declaration claimed, and gave judgment accordingly. From that judgment the defendants now appeal to this court, and counsel on their behalf has relied not only on the argument based on illegality (which the learned judge considered and rejected), but also on a further argument, not raised before the learned judge, to the effect that in any case the notice of Dec. 4, 1951, was not a valid exercise of the option even if (contrary to his contention) the option itself was still valid and subsisting at the date of its purported exercise by the plaintiff.

C To deal first with the argument based on illegality. We may say at once that we agree with the learned judge's conclusions, although we prefer to put our reasons for coming to that conclusion in a somewhat different way. For the purposes of this argument the vital points seem to us to be these. First, on the assumption that, apart from the question of illegality, the notice purporting to exercise the option was a valid exercise of it, the option was exercised when the letter enclosing it was received by the defendants, that is, apparently on Dec. 7, 1951; secondly, the option agreement provided that on the exercise of the option the defendants should grant the plaintiff a new lease on the stipulated terms "forthwith"; thirdly, the term to be granted by the new lease was to run from June 24, 1953, the date of the expiry of the existing term; fourthly, the legislative position in regard to the duration of the Act of 1946 at the material period was that immediately before Dec. 7, 1951, it was due to expire on Mar. 31, 1952, to which date its life had been prolonged by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, 1950, and that on Dec. 7, 1951, the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, 1951, further extended its duration until Mar. 31, 1953.

F The argument based on illegality is put in two ways. First, it is said that the mere granting to the plaintiff of a lease for seven years from June 24, 1953, at the rent of £525 per annum would (in view of the reduction by the tribunal of the rent payable for the flat to £425 per annum and the registration of the rent as so reduced) in itself amount to a "requiring" by the defendants of rent in excess of the rent entered in the register, and thus constitute a transaction in terms made unlawful by s. 4 (1) of the Act and a contravention of that section punishable as an offence under s. 9. Alternatively, it is said that in these circumstances the option agreement has become illegal in the sense that its terms, as contemplated by the parties, can no longer be lawfully carried out, demanding, as they do, a lawful and recoverable rent of £525 per annum. Whichever way it is put, we do not see how the argument can be maintained in the face of the four vital points to which we have referred. It is, perhaps, just conceivable that the grant of a lease taking effect in possession at a given rent might be said in itself to amount to a "requiring" of that rent within the meaning of s. 4 (1), though we are far from so holding. It is hardly conceivable that the granting of a lease to take effect from some future date at a given rent to become payable from and after that future date should in itself be held to amount to such a "requiring", and, as at present advised, we would not so hold. But, however these two hypothetical cases may stand, the actual position in the present case was that (apart from any defect in the notice itself) the option was exercised, and the defendants became obliged, according to the terms of the option agreement, to grant the lease "forthwith", on Dec. 7, 1951. Thus, allowing the most lenient interpretation to the word "forthwith", the defendants ought to have granted the plaintiff a lease at £525 per annum for a term of seven years commencing from June 24, 1953, at a time when the whole of that future term fell beyond the date (viz., Mar. 31, 1953) then fixed for the duration of the Act of 1946. It seems to us quite impossible to hold that the mere granting of a lease at a given rent to take effect from a date after the date for the time being fixed for the duration of the Act of 1946 amounts to a "requiring" of that rent in contravention of any of the provisions of that Act. If the duration of the Act is subsequently extended so as to embrace wholly or in part the term granted by the lease, then in respect of so much of the term as falls within the extended duration of the Act the lessor will be precluded from requiring or receiving more than the registered rent. But he cannot, in our view, be said to have "required" more than the registered rent by granting a lease at a given rent to take effect from a future date at which, as the law stands at the date of the grant, the Act of 1946 will have expired and the registration of rents thereunder will have ceased to have any legal effect. Nor, in our view, can it be said that an agreement to grant a lease from a future date which, when the time comes for granting the lease according to the terms of the agreement, falls after the date for the time being fixed for the expiration of the Act of 1946, is impossible of performance because the rent reserved exceeds the registered rent, so that, if such expiration is subsequently postponed to a date overlapping the commencement of the term to be granted, the excess of the contractual over the registered rent will not be lawfully recoverable. In such a case, it seems to us that the agreement to grant the lease, at the time fixed for its performance, is perfectly legal and must be performed accordingly, and the lessor must take his chance of his right to recover the full rent reserved by the lease, when the time for payment of such rent arrives, being defeated by some further extension of the duration of the Act of 1946. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the argument based on illegality must fail.

There remains the new point, not taken below, to the effect that on the footing that the option was still valid and subsisting at the date when the plaintiff purported to exercise it his notice purporting to do so was not a valid exercise of the option. Although this point was not argued below, it was, as has appeared above, open on the pleadings, and as it is a point of law arising on undisputed facts, we think we would be wrong to exclude it from consideration here. It is, however, only right that a new point taken at this late stage should be somewhat jealously scrutinised. The argument on this point turns entirely on the inclusion in the notice of Dec. 4, 1951, of the words

"reduced to £425 for the duration of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, by the decision of the rent tribunal for Bournemouth and Area notified on Feb. 2, 1950", which follow the words

"for a further term of seven years from June 24, 1953, at the yearly rent of £525."

Apart from the inclusion of the additional words we have quoted, the document appears to be in point of form unexceptionable as a perfectly good exercise of the option. But it is suggested that these additional words have the effect of making the lease called for by the notice of Dec. 4, 1951, a lease in different terms from those of the lease offered by the option agreement. If that were indeed the case, the point would, as it seems to us, be unanswerable. An option to take a lease at a specified rent is not well exercised by a notice demanding a lease at some lower rent. But we do not think it is possible, on a reasonable construction of the additional words, to attribute to them a meaning which would have the effect of vitiating the notice on that ground. It would, we think, be a strained construction of the words in question to interpret them as demanding a lease at the rent of £525 per annum reduced to £425 per annum for the duration of the Act of 1946, irrespective of any upward revision of the permitted rent which might be made by any further decision made by the tribunal on a re-consideration of the case under s. 2 (3) of the Act. It is true that the reference is to the tribunal's decision notified on Feb. 2, 1950, which is described as reducing the rent to £425 for the duration of the Act, but that is no more than a perfectly accurate description of the tribunal's decision as it stood at the date of the notice and still stands, and we do not think it can fairly be construed as impliedly depriving the defendants of the benefit of any upward revision of the permitted rent which might be made by the tribunal after the date of the notice, whether before or after the execution of the lease or the commencement of the further term thereby granted. Giving the best consideration we can to the construction of the words in question, with due regard to the surrounding circumstances and to the provisions of the Act, we do not think they can fairly be held to be anything more than declaratory of the legal effect of the granting of a lease on the terms offered by the option agreement, the lease called for by the notice being nothing more nor less than a lease strictly in those terms. In our view, the disputed words are really no more than a parenthetical reference to the fact that, while the lease to which the plaintiff was entitled, and for which he called by the notice exercising the option, was a lease for seven years from June 24, 1953, at the rent of £525 per annum and otherwise in the form prescribed by the option agreement, the rent would, during so much of the term as might fall within the duration of the Act of 1946, be reduced to £425 per annum by the tribunal's decision notified on Feb. 2, 1950, so long as that decision remained in force. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the new point based on the alleged invalidity of the notice exercising the option also fails, with the result that the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

It is not without regret that we reach this conclusion, for the case is one in which the provisions of the Act of 1946 appear to us to work an injustice to the defendant landlords. It is an undesirable, though it may be unavoidable, by-product of this enactment that a man negotiating under no pressure, and on equal terms, is thereby enabled to take a lease for a term of years at a specified rent, and at any time after he has secured the lease obtain from the appropriate tribunal a substantial reduction in the rent to which he has freely agreed, while nevertheless holding the landlord to his side of the bargain. It is, no doubt, true that the whole object of the Act, designed as it is to prevent landlords from exploiting a shortage of accommodation, would be stultified if contracting out were permitted, or if landlords were enabled to rescind the leases of tenants for terms of years who availed themselves of the statutory right to apply for a reduction in their rents. It is, no doubt, also true that it would be difficult, and it may be impracticable, to limit the application of the Act in such a way as to confine its operation to cases of real hardship or oppression. But one cannot help feeling that in practice advantage is taken of the Act by tenants in no need of protection—tenants, for example, who are in a position to take flats of a class commanding rents of several hundred pounds a year—for the purpose of benefiting themselves at the expense of their landlords and in derogation of bargains freely and deliberately made. In other words, the Act, which was designed to prevent the exploitation of tenants by landlords, may in such cases be made an engine for the exploitation of landlords by tenants. In the present case, the hardship on the defendants is twofold. Not only have they had to submit to a reduction of their rent from £525 to £425 during the latter part of the term originally granted, but they are now under an obligation to grant a lease for a further term of seven years during part, and it may well be the whole, of which the rent of £525 stipulated for by them, and agreed to by the plaintiff in the option agreement, will be similarly reduced. We would willingly have held them relieved from the last-mentioned obligation had we been able to find any justification in law for so doing. If at the time when the new lease ought to have been granted (i.e., forthwith after the exercise of the option) the duration of the Act of 1946 as then fixed had extended beyond the date of the commencement of the new term (namely, June 24, 1953), we would, as at present advised, have been disposed to hold the defendants relieved on the ground that the new lease could not lawfully have been granted at a recoverable rent of £525 per annum, and that the agreement under which it was to have been granted had accordingly become impossible of performance because it could not be legally performed. To this extent we are, as at present advised, disposed to part company with the learned judge, who appears to have proceeded on the ground that the possibility of some further decision of the tribunal restoring the contractual rent of £525 before the commencement of the new term sufficed to prevent impossibility of lawful performance being imputed to the option agreement at the time when the lease ought to have been granted. We find difficulty in seeing why the defendants should have been required to accept the mere possibility of the full rent of £525 being once more lawfully recoverable as from the commencement of the new term, by virtue of a purely hypothetical further decision of the tribunal, in substitution for the right to a lawfully recoverable rent of £525 for which they had bargained and to which the plaintiff had agreed. But we see no answer to the point that at the time when the new lease ought to have been executed the new term to be granted by it fell wholly outside the period then fixed for the duration of the Act of 1946. However probable it may have been that such duration would in fact be extended so as to overlap the commencement of the new term, we cannot regard the existence of that contingency as sufficing to relieve the defendants of their obligation to grant the new lease at the time when it ought to have been granted. That being so, it follows that on the principle that equity looks on that as done which ought to have been done the plaintiff should be put in the same position as he would have been in if the new lease had actually been granted at the proper time, and the defendants cannot escape their obligation to grant it on the ground that since that time the duration of the Act of 1946 has been extended to Mar. 31, 1954.

We would, therefore, dismiss the appeal, although we would be disposed, in order to avoid any possibility of dispute hereafter, and to make it clear that the court is not countenancing anything inconsistent with the Act of 1946, to amplify the declaration made by the learned judge by adding words to the effect that for the duration of the Act of 1946 the lease to be granted pursuant to such declaration will, as regards the amount of the rent payable thereunder, take effect subject to the provisions of that Act, and to any decision of the relevant rent tribunal under it for the time being in force.

Appeal dismissed.

B A company sold its undertaking to the Crown, ceased to trade, and was wound-up, but it was found as a fact that the trade had not been discontinued, but had been carried on by the Crown. The company was assessed to income tax for the period terminating on the date of sale in the sum of £850,000 in respect of balancing charges under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, arising on the sale of the plant and machinery included in the transaction.

C HELD: (i) “person” in r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918 (as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)) included the Crown, and, therefore, the Crown had succeeded to the trade within the meaning of the rule, with the result that the company was liable to be assessed under the rule as if the trade had been discontinued and balancing charges on the sale fell to be made in respect of the basis period ending on the date of the sale.

D (ii) the requirement in r. 11 (2) that the tax of the company should be computed as if the trade “had then been discontinued” did not prevent the sale from being regarded as occurring before “the trade is permanently discontinued” under s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945, because, in fact, it had not been discontinued, and, under the sub-section, discontinuance did not include “the happening of any event which by . . . r. 11 . . . is to be treated as equivalent to the discontinuance of the trade.”

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The appellant company appealed against an assessment to income tax made on it under sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for 1947-48 in the sum of £850,000. The assessment was made in respect of balancing charges under Part II of the Income Tax Act, 1945, alleged to arise on the sale by the company of its plant and machinery to the Madras government on Aug. 29, 1947, as part of the sale of the undertaking. On the date of sale the company ceased to trade, but its undertaking was carried on without interruption in Madras under the management of a department of the Madras government. On Sept. 29, 1950, the company went into voluntary liquidation. It was common ground between the parties that by reason of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, the balancing charges forming the subject of the assessment fell to be made on it, if at all, for the year of assessment in the company's basis period in which the sale of its plant and machinery occurred, that for the purposes of the Act the sale occurred on Aug. 29, 1947, and that, by reason of s. 57 (2) of the Act of 1945, the company's basis period for 1947-48 was the period on the profits or gains of which income tax fell to be computed under Case I of sched. D in respect of its trade.

The Crown contended that on Aug. 29, 1947, there was a succession to the company's trade, which brought into operation r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D (as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)), and that under that rule the tax payable by the company for all years of assessment fell to be computed as if the trade had been discontinued on that date, and that, by reason of s. 31 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1926, the company fell to be charged to income tax for 1947-48 on the amount of the profits or gains for the period from Apr. 6 to Aug. 29, 1947, that that period was the company's basis period for 1947-48, and in it occurred the sale of the plant and machinery. The company contended, inter alia, that the person succeeding to the company's trade on Aug. 29, 1947, was the Crown and that r. 11 (2) had no application where the Crown succeeded to a trade. It submitted, alternatively, that, if the Crown did not succeed to the trade, the person so succeeding was not a person chargeable to income tax in respect thereof and that r. 11 (2) had no application where the person succeeding to the trade in question was not so chargeable.

The commissioners found that the trade or undertaking in Madras carried on by the company up to Aug. 29, 1947, was not discontinued at that date, but continued to be carried on in Madras after that date by the Crown. They held that r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D did not apply to the case because (i) in their view "any person" in the main charging rules of the schedule did not refer to the Crown and they saw no reason for giving it any different meaning in r. 11 (2), and, moreover, (ii) the context of r. 11 (2) seemed to indicate that the "person" therein referred to must be a person who was or might in certain events be liable to the charge imposed by sched. D, and they did not see how the Crown could be such a person. They did not decide whether the "person" referred to must in any event be a person actually liable to income tax in respect of the trade. They allowed the appeal and reduced the assessment to £379 less capital allowances £379. The Crown appealed.

Curr. adv. vult.

June 18. UPJOHN, J., read the following judgment. The principal point in this case is whether in r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918 [as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)], the word "person" includes "the Crown". The Special Commissioners have held it does not. There is also a subsidiary point not raised before the commissioners, but sought to be raised before me.

A The respondent company was incorporated on Jan. 27, 1906, with the object, as its name would imply, of carrying on the business of suppliers of electricity in Madras. The company did so under three licences granted by the government of Madras, and each of these licences provided that on Aug. 29, 1947, the local authorities, whom failing the local government, should have the option of purchasing the electricity undertaking of the company. The option was duly exercised by the local government, and as on the said Aug. 29, 1947, the company sold and the local government purchased the undertaking for 215 lakhs of rupees, the sterling equivalent actually received being £1,611,437. The commissioners have found as a fact that the trade or undertaking in Madras was not discontinued on Aug. 29, 1947, but continued to be carried on without interruption there under a department of the Madras government. It is conceded that, for the purposes of this appeal, the Madras government is a branch of the Crown, and, therefore, the purchaser of the undertaking was the Crown. So far as the principal point is concerned, it is also conceded that prima facie on the sale of the company's plant and machinery a balancing charge of some £850,000 or thereabouts fell to be made on the company under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The relevant year of assessment in respect of that charge is to be ascertained by finding out the company's "basis period" which is defined in s. 57 (2) of the Act. I need not consider that section, for it is conceded by the company that, if r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, is applicable, then, having regard to s. 31 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1926, the company would fall to be assessed to income tax for the year 1947-48 on its profits from Apr. 5 to Aug. 29, 1947, and it would be subject to assessment on the balancing charge for the same period. The company, however, submit that r. 11 (2) has no application because the Crown is not a person, and that the balancing charge fell to be assessed pursuant to r. 9 in respect of the following year, when the company, having ceased to trade, was not in fact assessable at all under Case I.

E In view of the submissions made to me, it will be convenient to trace the history of the relevant rules in tax legislation before reading the vital r. 11 (2) itself. In the Income Tax Act, 1842, in r. 4 dealing with Cases I and II of sched. D, it was provided that, whenever there was any change in any partnership by death, dissolution or the admission of a new partner, or whenever any person succeeded to any trade, tax was to be computed according to normal principles (then the three years average) notwithstanding such change or succession. There was no provision for apportionment of the profits as between predecessor and successor in that Act, but by s. 134 it was provided in effect that, where there was a succession, both the predecessor and the successor should be liable, presumably at the option of the Crown. The first provision for apportionment of tax between predecessor and successor is to be found in s. 62 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, where it was provided that where one ceased to carry on business and there was a succession a certificate was to be given to the commissioners, and then sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) provided:

H " (2) On the receipt of such certificate the commissioners shall cause notice to be given to the respective parties of a meeting of commissioners for considering the same; and the commissioners shall, on the examination of the respective parties, if in attendance, or on other satisfactory proof of the facts, adjust the assessment by charging the successor with a fair proportion thereof from the period of his succeeding to the concern and relieving the person originally assessed from a like amount. (3) The determination of the commissioners on any such certificate shall be final, and the assessment so adjusted shall be recoverable from the respective parties in like manner as an original assessment; and if either of the parties has paid in respect of an assessment so certified more than the proportion which appears by the determination of the commissioners to be chargeable on him, the amount so over-paid shall, when recovered from the party liable, be paid to the person by whom the overpayment was made."

These provisions were consolidated in the Income Tax Act, 1918, the earlier r. 4 and s. 62 of the Act of 1880 appearing as r. 11 and r. 9 respectively of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D and s. 134 of the Act of 1842 as r. 3 of the Miscellaneous Rules Applicable to Sched. D. Then by the Finance Act, 1926, drastic alterations were made. Section 31 provided that, where a trade was permanently discontinued, profits for the last year were to be charged on the profits from the last Apr. 6 to the date of discontinuance, with a right on the part of the Crown to re-open the previous year's assessment. Section 32 repealed the existing r. 11 and re-enacted the following, which, as since amended by the Finance Act, 1930, s. 16, is r. 11 as applicable in the present case. I must read it in full:

"11.—(1) If at any time after Apr. 5, 1928, a change occurs in a partnership of persons engaged in any trade, profession or vocation, by reason of retirement or death, or the dissolution of the partnership as to one or more of the partners, or the admission of a new partner, in such circumstances that one or more of the persons who until that time were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation continue to be engaged therein, or a person who until that time was engaged in any trade, profession or vocation on his own account continues to be engaged in it, but as a partner in a partnership, the tax payable by the person or persons who carry on the trade, profession or vocation after that time shall, notwithstanding the change, be computed according to the profits or gains of the trade, profession or vocation during the period prescribed by the Income Tax Acts; Provided that, where all the persons who were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation both immediately before and immediately after the change require, by notice signed by all of them or, in the case of a deceased person, by his legal representatives, and sent to the surveyor within twelve months after the change took place, that the tax payable for all years of assessment shall be computed as if the trade, profession or vocation had been discontinued at the date of the change, and a new trade, profession or vocation had been then set up or commenced, and that the tax so computed for any year shall be charged on and paid by such of them as would have been charged if such discontinuance and setting up or commencement had actually taken place, the tax shall be computed, charged, collected and paid accordingly. (2) If at any time after the said Apr. 5 any person succeeds to any trade, profession or vocation which until that time was carried on by another person and the case is not one to which para. (1) of this rule applies, the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person succeeding as aforesaid shall be computed as if he had set up or commenced the trade, profession or vocation at that time, and the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person who until that time carried on the trade, profession or vocation shall be computed as if it had then been discontinued. In this paragraph references to a person include references to a partnership."

There was no alteration to r. 9, which remained, and gave rise to much discussion as to how far r. 9 remained effective having regard to the new form of r. 11. The history of these rules and the conflict, if I may so describe it, between r. 9 and r. 11, were the subject of elaborate opinions delivered in the House of Lords in Income Tax Comrs. v. Gibbs (1), but the brief outline I have given is, I hope, sufficient to make clear the submissions made to me based on the historical development of the relevant taxing provisions.

A The case for the Crown can be stated concisely. It is submitted, and not disputed, that the Crown is a corporation sole, and, therefore, a person: see s. 19 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. Therefore, it is said, the case where the Crown purchases a business or trade is within r. 11 (2). It is submitted that the true approach to the rule is that throughout the Act the word "person" must be given its ordinary wide meaning. Thus it is said a person resident outside this country who does not carry on business in this country is not taxed for the reason that, although he is a "person" for the purposes of the Act, he is not a person who is within the class of persons mentioned in any of the sub-headings in para. 1 (a) of sched. D. So, to give another example, a charitable trustee is not taxed, not because he fails to fulfil the definition of a person for the purposes of the Act, but because, although such a person, he is exempt from taxation by s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. Finally, it is said that the Crown is not taxed, not because it fails to fulfil the definition of person for the purposes of the Act, but because, as it is not expressly mentioned in the Act, the rights of the Crown cannot be prejudiced by anything in the Act: Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford (2).

C It is pointed out that, if the contrary view be right, namely, that the Crown is exempted from tax because, on the true construction of the Act, it is not a "person", the wealth of learning to be found in the authorities on the immunity of the Crown from taxation was quite unnecessary. A number of authorities was cited to me on this point. I do not propose to review them all at length, for the exact point I have to consider was never raised. It is sufficient to refer to one passage in Coomber v. Berks JJ. (3). In the House of Lords, LORD BLACKBURN said (9 App. Cas. 71):

E "It seems to me that it is not material whether the assessment statute imposing any tax does so, like the Poor Rate Acts, for a local purpose, or like the statute imposing a duty on post-horses, considered in R. v. Cook (4), or the income tax, for an imperial purpose. In each there is an implied exemption on the ground of prerogative. And if the property is so held as to bring it within the ground of exemption for the one statute, it must surely be brought within the ground of exemption for the other."

F That seems inconsistent with the view that the Crown is immune from taxation because it is not a person for the purposes of taxing Acts. Then, again, in Slatford's case (2), it is said that the illuminating judgments in the Court of Appeal on "Crown status" and "Crown purposes" would have been quite unnecessary if the short answer was that, as a matter of construction, the Crown, and, therefore, its servant, the Custodian of Enemy Property, were not a person for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and the decision must have been the other way. I think there is much force in the contention of the Crown on this point. It was next submitted that it would be a most strained and unnatural construction of the Act to hold that the principles of taxation of a vendor of a business should vary according to the apparently irrelevant circumstance whether the vendor should happen to sell to another subject of the Crown or to the Crown itself.

H On the other hand, counsel for the company submits that the only safe guide is to consider the necessary construction which must be placed on the word "person" in a taxing Act. He points out that, in every taxing Act going back for many years, there is a preamble in the following form:

"Most Gracious Sovereign, We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled, towards raising the necessary supplies to defray Your Majesty's public expenses, and making an addition to the public revenue, have freely and voluntarily resolved to give and grant unto Your Majesty the several duties hereinafter mentioned; and do therefore most humbly beseech

Your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—" then follow the substantive taxing provisions. It is said with force, having regard to that preamble, that the Crown as the grantee of the taxes cannot be a person for tax purposes, and that, in the charging provisions in the Income Tax Act, 1918, charging tax upon "persons" cannot sensibly include the Crown.

In support of that argument counsel for the company points to the history of the relevant rules which I have already summarised. He points out that, until the Finance Act, 1926, at all events, the relevant rule would be r. 9, re-enacting s. 62 of the Act of 1880, and he said the Crown could never be a "person" for the purposes of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3), for Parliament could not possibly have intended that the Crown should be summoned to appear before the commissioners. In further support of his argument, counsel drew my attention to certain of the Rules Applicable to sched. A. By No. VII, r. 1, income tax is charged on the occupier. By No. VIII, r. 1, the occupier is entitled to deduct such tax out of the next rent payable by him to the landlord. A special provision is made in the rule that the right to deduct is available against a receiver of Crown lands. Therefore, it is said, that prima facie shows that the Crown is, as a matter of construction of the Act, not a landlord. I do not find this argument very convincing because a special provision entitling a subject to deduct from rent against the Crown is necessary whichever of the contending views is right. The argument is also somewhat double-edged, for the rule refers in terms to a "receiver on behalf of the Crown or other person receiving the rent."

The next point of counsel for the company is that r. 11 (2) contemplates a predecessor and a successor both subject to tax. It is pointed out that in Income Tax Comrs. v. Gibbs (1), LORD MACMILLAN, in dealing with r. 9, points out ([1942] 1 All E.R. 425) that the word "person" denotes an entity of assessment. Therefore, it is said, for the rule to apply there must be found two entities of assessment, a predecessor and a successor, both of them subject to tax. LORD MACMILLAN however, was dealing with quite a different problem. The sole question was whether r. 9 applied to the case of admission of a new partner to a firm of stockbrokers carrying on business in the City of London, having regard to the new r. 11 introduced by the 1926 Act. LORD MACMILLAN was not in any way concerned with the position of the Crown, and it would be contrary to every principle of construction to lift his words out of their context and try to apply them to the case before me.

The question ultimately comes to a very short point of construction as to the meaning of the word "person" in r. 11 (2), and to paraphrase the words of LORD DUNEDIN, delivering his opinion in Fry v. Burma Corpn. (5) ([1930] A.C. 327), another taxing case although on quite a different point, it is safest to go by the ordinary meaning of words. There is here no context which compels me to give some special meaning to the word "person". In its ordinary meaning it is a word of widest import and apt to include the Crown. If some limitation is to be placed on the ambit of that word, difficulties arise, as the commissioners appear to recognise in their finding in the Case Stated. Is the word limited to "all persons other than the Crown" or to "all taxable persons". As a matter of construction, I see no ground for placing any limitation on the ordinary and natural meaning of the word. In my judgment, in r. 11 (2) the word "person" includes the Crown, persons resident abroad, or charity trustees and others who for different reasons may be found to be exempt from tax. Consequently, in my judgment, the commissioners came to a wrong conclusion on this point.

I must now turn to the subsidiary point briefly mentioned at the beginning of my judgment. In an undated letter sent after the hearing before the commissioners the company gave notice that they would rely on a recent decision in the Court of Session, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr (6). In reply to that letter the Crown stated that they would rely on proviso (ii) to s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. Judgment was given in Barr's case (6) on Jan. 13, 1953. The point arose in this way. In an earlier case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (7), reported together with Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West (7), a fishing vessel, the Girl Eileen, was sold, and, although the purchaser continued to use the vessel for fishing, there was nothing in the nature of a purchase of the vendors' business and goodwill or undertaking as fishermen but only of the ship, and it was found as a fact that on the sale of the ship there was a simultaneous permanent discontinuance of the trade. On these facts the Court of Session naturally held that, on the true construction of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, a claim to a balancing charge failed, though both the Lord President and LORD KEITH expressed the view that a balancing charge could only be recovered from persons still carrying on the trade. That decision has, however, no application to the facts of the present case, having regard to the finding of fact that there was no discontinuance of the trade or undertaking though it was carried on by another. The present case is clearly one where (apart from the argument on "person") one person succeeds to a trade of another within the meaning of r. 11 (2). The provision at the end of s. 17 (1) is, therefore, relevant. It is in these terms:

"Any reference in this sub-section to the permanent discontinuance of a trade does not include a reference to the happening of any event which, by virtue of any of the provisions of r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, is to be treated as equivalent to the discontinuance of the trade."

In the subsequent case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr (6), however, the facts were similar to those before me. A business was sold as a going concern, but the Court of Session held that no balancing charge was leviable. They did so, as it appears from the very brief judgment, because counsel for the appellant, in opening the appeal, admitted that the ratio of West's case (7) (it was not disputed before me that in fact Reid's case (7) was the relevant case) covered the case then under appeal. That admission overlooked the relevant provision in s. 17 (1) which I have already read and which does not appear to have been drawn to the court's attention. Counsel for the company candidly did not endeavour to support the decision by independent reasoning, but he invited me to follow it. Normally I should feel it my duty to follow a unanimous decision of the Court of Session: see Re Hartland (8); Re D'Avigdor Goldsmid (9), per VAISEY, J. ([1951] 1 All E.R. 247); but in the circumstances I have mentioned I do not feel compelled to do so. Nor do I think this is a case where I ought to send the case back to the commissioners in order that the company may invite the commissioners to express new findings on this matter. It seems to me that the concluding words of s. 17 (1) govern this case on the findings of the commissioners, and I cannot treat this case as one where there has been a simultaneous discontinuance of the trade. A balancing charge is, therefore, leviable. The appeal must be allowed and the original assessment must be remitted to the commissioners for adjustment of the figures. The company must pay the Crown's costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to commissioners for adjustment of the figures.

PRACTICE NOTE.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), June 22, 1953.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Security for costs—Right of assisted person to order—Need of evidence of means.

ORIGINAL MOTION.

On Mar. 6, 1953, a wife who was an "assisted person" under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, obtained a decree nisi for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The husband having entered a notice of appeal, the wife's solicitors asked him for security for her costs of the appeal, but he refused to give security. The wife applied to the Court of Appeal for an order for security of costs.

Aarvold for the wife.Pain for the husband.

SOMERVELL, L.J., said that under s. 1 (7) (b) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, if it were proved that the wife was impecunious, the fact that she was an assisted person did not relieve the husband from liability to give security for her costs of the appeal. The mere fact that she was legally aided was not evidence of her impecuniosity, and there should be an affidavit before the court that she was impecunious.

JENKINS and HODSON, L.JJ., agreed.

An affidavit to the effect that the wife was impecunious was then produced and the court made an order for security of costs of £10.

Solicitors: Isadore Goldman & Son (for the wife); Helder, Roberts & Co. (for the husband). P.P.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Finnemore, J.), June 15, 16, 1953.]

Sale of Land—Contract—Agreement to discharge debt conditional on transfer of land—Whether contract for sale of land—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 205 (1) (xxiv).

In 1948, on the winding-up of a company, the company's land and other assets were divided by agreement between three persons, including the plaintiff and the defendant, leaving a sum of money owing by the defendant to the plaintiff which was to be paid by instalments. Three instalments were paid, but the defendant then ceased to pay, leaving a balance owing to the plaintiff of £217 10s. In the latter part of 1949 it was agreed in correspondence between the parties that the defendant should transfer to the plaintiff a certain piece of land in discharge of the debt. The plaintiff's solicitors wrote several times to the defendant asking him to implement this transfer, and in or about November, 1949, without entering into a formal contract, the defendant allowed the plaintiff to take possession of the land. The plaintiff's solicitors wrote several times thereafter asking the defendant to submit a draft contract for the transfer of the land, but the defendant took no action, and the matter fell into abeyance until the beginning of 1951, when the defendant was pressed to convey the land. In July, 1951, the plaintiff informed the defendant that the agreement between them must be regarded as terminated, and in September, 1951, a writ was issued claiming payment of £217 10s.

HELD: the agreement of 1949 was, not a contract for the sale of land, but an agreement to discharge a debt owed by the defendant to the plaintiff conditional on certain land being transferred by the defendant to the plaintiff, and, as the defendant had not fulfilled the condition within a reasonable time, the plaintiff was entitled to repudiate the agreement and to sue for the £217 10s. owed to him by the defendant.

B ACTION for breach of contract.

C Before 1948 a limited company (owned by the plaintiff, the defendant and a Mr. Williamson) carried on the business of fruit growing at Shalden, near Alton, Hampshire. In 1948 the three members of the company decided to separate, and it was agreed that the land, goods, and certain moneys of the company should be divided between them. As a result of this agreement the defendant owed the plaintiff a sum of money which was to be paid in instalments of £50 per month. Three instalments were paid, but thereafter the agreement was not carried out and a balance of £217 10s. was left owing to the plaintiff.

D On Sept. 6, 1949, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant pointing out that £217 10s. was still owing to the plaintiff, and stating that unless they received the money within three days a writ would be issued. The defendant replied on Sept. 11 saying that the plaintiff had suggested that the balance owing to him might be met by the transfer to him by the defendant of a small portion of land which would straighten the boundaries of their respective properties (which were contiguous). To this the plaintiff's solicitors replied on Sept. 12 that the plaintiff had never agreed to the suspension of the payments of £50 per month, but that he was interested in purchasing the land at a reasonable price, and added:

E " . . . If you transfer four-fifths of [an] acre to [the plaintiff] this should square all the debt owing between you. We shall be glad to know whether you are prepared to agree to this . . . "

F The defendant replied to this on Sept. 17:

" . . . possibly the transfer of the land he suggests may be the answer. It will be necessary first, however, to check the acreage . . . "

G The defendant did nothing further and the plaintiff's solicitors wrote on Oct. 25 and Oct. 28 saying that unless the defendant agreed to transfer the land or pay the money they would issue a writ. The defendant did in fact ultimately agree to transfer the land, and at about the same time he permitted the plaintiff to take possession of it. On Nov. 2, 1949, the plaintiff's solicitors by letter requested the defendant to instruct his solicitors to let them have a contract as soon as possible for the sale of the land. No contract was sent, however, and in July, 1951, the plaintiff, after some further correspondence (from which it appeared that the defendant had mortgaged his land), orally told the defendant that their agreement must be regarded as cancelled, and that he required payment of the £217 10s. which was still owing to him. Accordingly, a writ was issued by the plaintiff in September, 1951, claiming £217 10s., and a further small sum which was not in dispute.

H It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue for the money because the defendant was ready and willing to complete the transfer of the land, no date was ever fixed for completion, time was not of the essence of the contract (which was one for the sale of land), and the defendant was never called on to complete the matter by any particular date except in November, 1949, and this requirement was later waived. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the agreement was a contract that the debt due from the defendant should be discharged on condition that the land was transferred to the plaintiff and not a contract for the sale of land, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to repudiate the agreement when the defendant had taken no steps to fulfil his part of the bargain after a reasonable time. It was further contended by the plaintiff that even if the agreement were a sale of land, in the circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to repudiate the contract without delivering to the defendant a notice to complete within a specified period.

FINNEMORE, J., stated the facts and continued: I have been referred to a great many cases and I do not know that it will be of assistance merely to recite them or the passages which have been read to me. Counsel for the defendant quoted a passage from Smith v. Hamilton (1) ([1950] 2 All E.R. 935), which emphasised the position which arises when there is no time for completion fixed. The purchaser or vendor cannot just say: "The time has gone and the contract is at an end". Some kind of notice must be given or what has been called in this case, an ultimatum, to say that: "After a certain time if you do not complete this matter, we shall treat the contract as at an end." No such ultimatum ever was given in this case, and, therefore (it is argued), when the plaintiff said to the defendant in July that he was no longer bound by this agreement, whatever it was, he was acting wrongly, because he had not the power to do it. Counsel for the defendant also quotes Halkett v. Earl of Dudley (2), but I think that was rather on the point which counsel for the plaintiff concedes, i.e., that when the plaintiff found there was a mortgage on this land, he did not at once withdraw and on that ground repudiate, and did not, indeed, intend to do so.

The first point that I have to decide is: What was this contract between these two people? Was it a contract for the sale of land, or was it a contract that a debt due from one party to the other should be conditionally discharged, the condition being that this piece of land should be transferred from the defendant to the plaintiff? If the second alternative is the right one, all the complications and refinements, if one may so call them, which have been argued on both sides with regard to what happened afterwards appertaining to a contract for the sale of land will have no application, and the plaintiff is able to say: "You owe me money. I agreed to discharge that debt provided you transferred to me certain land, but you have never transferred that land to me. It was not on my shoulders to do anything about it; it was your responsibility. You have never made the transfer, in spite of the letters which have been written, and in spite of my personal interviews and requests nothing has been done; and, therefore, after a reasonable time had gone by, without issuing an ultimatum and without doing anything further, I was entitled to say, as I did, that you have not performed the condition, and the discharge is not valid, and I am, therefore, entitled to my £217 10s. which admittedly was due to me." The answer depends on what is meant by a sale of land. I am told by both counsel that there is no direct authority on this point, and they have not been able to find it dealt with anywhere.

I was referred to s. 205 (1) (xxiv) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which says: "'Sale' includes an extinguishment of manorial incidents, but in other respects means a sale properly so called." It is argued for the plaintiff that a sale means in the case of land, as in the case of goods, an exchange of land (or goods) for money. It is laid down quite clearly in the books which deal with

A sale of personal chattels that a sale or a contract of sale is an agreement to exchange goods for money, although it is possible that part of the consideration might be something other than money, as, for example, when a person buys a new car for an agreed price, part of which he pays in money and part of which he satisfies by means of surrendering another car. But the general principle of English law is that a sale means the exchanging of property for money. That applies—and I think both counsel agree with this—to a sale of land and a sale of chattels equally.

The real problem is: Is it still a sale if no money passes, but one person says to another, as in this case: If you give me a piece of land, I will excuse you the debt which you owe me. Is the agreement one for the discharge of a debt conditional upon the handing over of land, or is it for the sale of land, i.e., for the transfer of land in return for money? In my view, it is a fine point, but, doing the best I can in the absence of authority, on the principles so far as I understand them, I come to the view that it is not properly so called a contract for the sale of land, because it is not really an agreement to hand over land in return for money. It is an agreement to extinguish an existing debt if land is transferred.

I think it is to be noted that the land was never precisely measured, no exact price in money per acre or per square yard was ever agreed, and no attempt was ever made in any way whatever to relate the value of the land to the value of the debt which was due from the defendant to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was, possibly, anxious to have this land, and he was anxious to have his debt paid. The correspondence shows, I think quite plainly, that he was saying, either himself or through his solicitor, to the defendant: "Pay me my money or settle this debt by transferring this land to me."

I appreciate that in one or two letters the solicitors did refer to a sale and did refer to a price, but I have to look at the realities of the situation. It was not a sale in the ordinary meaning of that word.

If that is so, I do not think that it is disputed by counsel for the defendant that the onus then would be on the defendant to carry out his side of the bargain. That means that he must transfer the land, and none of the refinements which affect a contract for the sale of land when there is delay comes into the matter at all. The defendant would, of course, have a reasonable time in which to transfer the land. I should not think anybody could argue that he was not given reasonable time before the contract was repudiated by the plaintiff. Months went by. Even if he had not been requested to carry out his side of the bargain, it was his duty to do so. But I think he was requested on many occasions by the plaintiff. It is true that he was in possession of the land and, therefore, the urgency of the transfer may not have been unduly in the minds of either of them. I am satisfied that the plaintiff did try to get this matter finished, and it was the defendant who dealt with the matter in the most casual, off-hand and, indeed, negligent way. The defendant has never transferred the land and has, therefore, never carried out his side of the agreement, and the plaintiff is entitled to be paid his debt.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

STAPLEY v. GYPSUM MINES, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Asquith of Bishopstone), April 16, 21, 22, 23, June 25, 1953.]

Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Breach fault of deceased jointly with fellow workman—Liability of employers in respect of death of deceased—Apportionment of liability—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1).

The deceased was employed as a miner in the respondents' gypsum mine. On Aug. 21, 1950, he and D., a fellow workman of equal status, neither being in charge of the other, were directed by a foreman of the respondents to bring down the roof of a stope, in which they were proposing to work, as it was unsafe and likely to fall. After attempting unsuccessfully to bring it down, they jointly agreed to cease their efforts and to carry on with their normal work, D. going to perform some duties nearby, while the deceased went to work in the stope. In acting thus both workmen were in breach of their duty under the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, reg. 15. Shortly after resuming work the deceased was killed by a fall of part of the roof. In an action by his widow against the respondents under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846,

HELD: (i) (LORD PORTER and LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE dissenting) in disobeying the foreman's order the deceased and D. were equally negligent and in breach of their duty, and the negligence of the one was so "mixed up" with the negligence of the other that the negligence of the deceased could not be regarded as an independent act, unrelated to and distinct from their negligence, so as to make it the sole "real" or "effective" cause of the accident, and, therefore, D.'s fault should be regarded as having contributed to the accident, and the respondents, as his employers, were liable to the widow in damages.

(ii) the conduct of the deceased in entering and working in the stope before it had been made secure contributed more immediately to the accident than anything that D. did or failed to do, and, therefore, in apportioning the liability under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), the deceased's "share in the responsibility for the damage" should be assessed at eighty per cent., and the respondents were liable for twenty per cent.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal (SINGLETON, BIRKETT and MORRIS, L.J.J.), dated Apr. 7, 1952, and reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 1092, reversing an order of SELLERS, J., dated Dec. 20, 1951.

The appellant, the widow of a miner employed in the respondents' gypsum mine, claimed damages against the respondents under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of the death of her husband which was caused by the fall of the roof of a stope in which he was working. The deceased appellant was a workman had been charged by the respondents with the duty of bringing down the roof so as to make the stope safe to work in, but they had failed to do so, and the deceased had gone to work in the stope. The learned judge found in favour of the appellant on the ground that the respondents were liable for the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the workman who was working with the deceased, but he deducted one half of the award which he would otherwise have made, as he held that the deceased was partly to blame for the accident. On an appeal by the respondents and cross-appeal by the appellant, the Court of Appeal held that the deceased's own negligence and breach of statutory duty, and not that of the respondents, was the substantial cause of the deceased's death, and, accordingly, they allowed the appeal and dismissed the cross-appeal.

The House took time for consideration.

June 25. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this appeal is brought by Mrs. Seagull Gladys Stapley, the widow of Mr. John Sydney Stapley, against a decision of the Court of Appeal which held that her action failed. Before SELLERS, J., she had succeeded in recovering £1,512 10s., being half the damages of £3,025 which that learned judge found that she had sustained from the death of her husband.

Mr. Stapley was employed by the respondents as a breaker in their gypsum mine, and part of his duty was to break up gypsum rock, which had been blasted by a previous shift of workers, in order that it might be removed by scraper haulage from the spot where it lay. The circumstances giving rise to her claim are not in dispute and can be shortly stated. At about 4.15 p.m. on Aug. 21, 1950, Stapley and one Dale, in the course of their employment by the respondents, were underground in No. 9 stope at the respondents' gypsum mine in the county of Sussex. Stapley was a breaker and Dale a borer, which was a slightly more skilled task than that of breaker, but the two men were of equal status. Neither was in control of, or entitled to give orders to, the other. The task of Stapley was to break up gypsum with a pick or a drill to a size convenient for removal, and Dale's task was to prepare the stope in order that a scraper hauler could be installed in it to facilitate the removal of the gypsum. When they were about to commence work in the stope they both observed that the roof was unsafe and likely to fall, a condition which is of frequent occurrence in this class of mine, and particularly so in the stope in question, because a fault in the rock formation ran diagonally across its entrance. While the two men were in the stope and before they had commenced work, the respondents' foreman, Church, in the course of his regulation routine round of the mine came to the entrance of the stope, saw Stapley and Dale, and was informed by them of the condition of the roof. He there and then instructed them both to bring it down so as to render the position safe for work. The task of bringing down the roof was one which was understood by both men and was one within their capacity to perform without supervision. Moreover, they were both well aware that such an order meant that they were not to work in the stope until they had got the roof down. There were three methods by which that task could have been accomplished, all of which were well known to both, namely, with picks, with pinch bars, or by boring holes in the roof and then summoning the shot-firer to blast it down. Church left Stapley and Dale after he had instructed them to bring down the roof, it being unnecessary either for him, or anyone else, to be present to supervise them while they and this duty. For a period of approximately half an hour they attempted to perform their task, restricting themselves to the use of picks. They might, possibly, have used pinch bars and, certainly, might have resorted to boring and shot-firing, but, having failed to bring down the roof with picks, they decided to disregard the instructions of their foreman and to return to their respective duties of breaker and borer. Having made this decision, Dale went to perform his duties in the twitten near No. 9 stope, leaving Stapley to work in the stope itself under the roof which they had been ordered to bring down and which they both knew had shown signs of danger but believed to be safe enough. A short time after they had abandoned their attempts to bring down the roof and had commenced their respective work, Dale returned to No. 9 stope, and found Stapley buried beneath a quantity of gypsum which had fallen from the roof and killed him.

The liability sought to be placed on the respondents was based on common law and on a breach of the provisions of reg. 7 (3) and reg. 14 (5) of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 630, as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1351), made under s. 86 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, as applied to metalliferous mines by the Mining Industry Act, 1920. Certain others of the regulations were relied on as having some bearing on the point at issue, and are, accordingly, inserted here:

" 7 (3). The roof and sides of every travelling road, outlet and working place shall be made secure, and no person, unless engaged in repairing or in investigating the safety of the workings shall travel on or work in any travelling road or working place which is not so made secure."

" 14 (1). The owner or agent shall carry out the provisions of the Acts, the regulations, and the special rules and to the best of his power enforce the observance thereof, and he shall give such directions as may be necessary to ensure compliance with those provisions and to secure the safety of the mine, and the safety, health and proper discipline of the persons employed . . . (5). The owner or agent, or an official appointed in writing by him for the purpose, shall—(a) during every ordinary mineral-getting shift, inspect every working place and road in every part of the mine in which persons work or along which they have to pass . . . every dangerous place shall be fenced off, or, if this is not practicable, adequate warning shall be given so that such place shall not be inadvertently entered by any person . . . (7). If any danger is revealed by the examination or inspection, steps shall be taken at once to remove it and except for that purpose any person exposed to the danger shall be withdrawn."

" 15 (1). Every person employed at the mine shall comply with the provisions of the Acts, the regulations and the special rules and any regulations made by the owner or agent in pursuance thereof and with such directions concerning safety and discipline as may be given to him by those in authority over him. (2) Every workman employed in the mine shall, before commencing work, and during the course of it, especially after blasting, make a careful examination of his working place, and so far as practicable remove any or secure any loose rock, stones or ground which might be dangerous. (3). Every person employed at the mine who notices anything that appears unsafe, or likely to cause danger, shall remedy the matter if it is within the scope of his duty, and if not shall withdraw forthwith from the place of danger and report the matter to the owner, agent, or other responsible official . . . (10). No person shall negligently or wilfully do anything likely to endanger life or limb in the mine, or negligently or wilfully omit to do anything necessary for the safety of the mine or of the persons employed therein."

Both grounds of claim were forcibly argued before your Lordships' House, based in each case substantially on the same facts and reasoning. So far as the statute was concerned it was submitted that the duty under regult was to make the roof and sides of the working place secure was an absolute one, that the respondents had failed to do so, albeit through no personal fault of their own, and that they had not fulfilled the requirements of the regulation, though they had taken all usual or, indeed, all possible steps to comply with their obligations. It is true, the appellant admitted, that contributory negligence was a defence in part to such a claim and it was conceded that Stapley was himself negligent and in part the author of his own death. But Dale, it was urged, was also negligent, as he also had failed to carry out his employers' orders and was in breach of reg. 15 (1), (2), (3) and (10). The respondents, as employers, it was submitted, were responsible for the negligence or neglect of duty of their employees, of whom Dale was one. Dale's action was, it was said, at any rate in part the cause of Stapley's death, and, now that the doctrine of common employment has been abrogated and contributory negligence is no longer a complete defence, Dale's employers are affected by Dale's breach and must pay the penalty, in so far as his fault contributed to the disaster. This view, as I understand it, was that which appealed to the learned judge, and he based his decision on it without distinguishing between a common law and a statutory liability.

C My Lords, a number of alleged acts of negligence were inserted in the statement of claim, but all save two were disposed of by the learned judge and are not now relied on. The two remaining are that the respondents "failed to make the said roof of the said stope or working place secure, contrary to reg. 7 (3) of the said regulations,"

D and (by amendment) that

"the said Dale their servant failed to bring down the said roof by firing or boring holes for firing and/or failed to report to the said Church his inability to bring down the said roof."

E It was on those allegations, which he found to be proved, that SELLERS, J., held the respondents liable. As, in his view, however, Stapley was in part to blame for the accident, he deducted one half of the award which he would otherwise have given. The appellant now accepts the decision of SELLERS, J., and does not seek to disturb his finding that Stapley's own act contributed to his death or the apportionment consequent thereon. The Court of Appeal agreed that the respondents were in breach of their statutory duty, in that they had not fulfilled the obligation imposed on them by reg. 7 (3) of keeping the roof secure, and that that duty was absolute. They also, like SELLERS, J., were of opinion that both men had failed to carry out the orders of their foreman, Church, and, therefore, had broken the statutory obligation imposed by reg. 15 (1), (2), (3) and (10). Once those findings are accepted it is, to my mind, unnecessary to consider whether either masters or men had neglected any of the other duties which the statute enjoined. They were in breach and it could make no difference whether the breach was less or greater, except, possibly, to the extent to which the blame was distributed and the amount to be deducted from the appellant's award. All the members of the Court of Appeal, however, absolved the respondents from liability, but, so far as I am able to judge, not wholly on the same grounds. It was said, on the one hand, that the obligation placed on Stapley and Dale was a joint obligation and each was wholly to blame for neglecting to carry it out. One can set out the proposition in the words of BIRKETT, L.J. He says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1101):

"Now, there is no doubt that the men were charged with the statutory duty jointly, and the learned judge so finds. Whatever may be attributed to Dale by way of breach of duty can be attributed to Stapley with equal force. If Stapley had not failed in his statutory duty the drummy roof would have been brought down whatever Dale did or did not do. Why, Because one of the two men is killed should the breach of duty be attributed to Dale the survivor in order to make the employers liable? It was a joint duty, not the duty of Dale alone, but by the amendment the learned judge indicated that he was deciding the case as though Stapley had nothing to do with the breach of duty that resulted in the drummy roof being left without being brought down, though he recognised that Stapley was equally to blame. The two men had mutually agreed to disobey the orders of Church, and in so doing they committed offences against the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts of 1872 and 1875, punishable by fine and imprisonment. It seems to me to be impossible to say that the employers were guilty of a breach of statutory duty because of the default of Dale without saying in the same breath that they were at the same time guilty of the same breach because of the default of Stapley."

The other ground was that the cause of the death was, in the legal sense, the resumption of work by Stapley under the "drummy" roof.

Again, BIRKETT, L.J., says (ibid.):

"But I think this appeal can be decided on another ground. It seems clear that if the inquiry to be made is: What was the cause of Stapley's death?, then the answer must be that it was his own breach of duty in resuming work under the drummy roof. If he had not done that, it is obvious that he would not have been killed."

SINGLETON and MORRIS, L.J.J., appear, on the other hand, to rely mainly on the first of the two reasons.

My Lords, I find the first ground elusive and difficult. It may be that in some future case your Lordships will be confronted with the difficulty of finding a solution. For myself, I am content to say that I agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal on the second point. The cause of Stapley's death, to my mind, was brought about by his own return to the stope. Causation is always a difficult topic. One is but using a commonplace if one repeats that many causes have some place in the sequence of events which lead to a result or if one follows LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, in Leyland Shipping Co. v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society (1), in saying ([1918] A.C. 369) that "Causation is not a chain, but a net". The question always is: How far back is one justified in going, or how wide a net must one envisage? In the present case, both men, it is true, neglected their duty, and it is said that they agreed to do so. The exact meaning of what their agreement amounted to has never been inquired into or elucidated. For my own part, I agree with MORRIS, L.J., when he says (ibid., 1106):

"I do not consider that their 'agreement' should be considered as denoting more than their concurrence in a joint decision to abandon their duty to make the roof secure."

Each, in my view, after discussing the matter with the other, went his own way and returned to his own work. If I did not hold this opinion, a further question might require consideration, viz., whether Stapley, in agreeing that Dale should return to his work and leave the appointed task undone, was not to that extent also the victim of his own negligence so that his, and not Dale's, act was the cause of his death. It was urged that, if Dale had insisted on continuing the work or had started to bore holes for shot-firing, Stapley would have followed his lead. It may be so, but such a conclusion is, at best, speculative, and in any case it was not Dale's place to command or persuade his comrade to do his duty. The more forcible argument is to say that Stapley's death was caused by the fall of the roof, that that fall would not have occurred if Dale had either bored the roof for shot-firing and obtained the assistance of a shot-firer, or reported again to Church. It may, indeed, be said that, historically, the fall of the roof was a cause of the accident, but though it was a cause, yet, in my opinion, it was not, in a legal sense, the cause. The result was brought about by Stapley's own act and for that act his employers are not liable.

- A My Lords, a number of authorities were brought to your Lordships' attention, I think for two purposes: (i) to show that the duty of the respondents under reg. 7 (3) was an absolute one, and (ii) to direct your Lordships' minds to the relevant approach to matters of causation. For my own part, I do not find myself much helped in this way. In the first place, I am content, for the purpose of this case, to assume, without deciding, that the employers' duty under reg. 7 (3) is absolute, and such an assumption does not conflict with my view as to what the result of the case should be. In the second place, one example of what has been deemed to be the cause of an event is of but slight assistance to the true view in other and different circumstances. I agree, indeed, with the opinion which has been commonly held since the decision of Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Volute (2), viz., that the abolition of the rule that any contributory negligence, however small, on the part of a plaintiff defeated his claim has no effect on causation. It enables the court (be it judge or jury) to seek less strenuously to find some ground for holding the plaintiff free from blame, or for reaching the conclusion that his negligence played no part in the ensuing accident, inasmuch as, owing to the change in the law, the blame can now be apportioned equitably between the two parties. What was the cause of an event, however, leads to an inquiry of the same nature as existed before the change. I should add that, if I took the view which commended itself to the learned judge, I should, nevertheless, think the proportions in which he divided the blame attributed far too much to Dale. If I were left to myself I should place it at an infinitesimal quantity, but, if the matter becomes material, I should not think it necessary to dissent from an allowance to the representatives of the deceased man of twenty per cent. of the total damage, i.e., £605.

- E LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, the only question which was decided in the courts below, and the only question fully argued before your Lordships, was whether the breach of duty by Dale was causally connected with the death of the appellant's husband, Stapley. The doctrine of common employment having been abolished, there is no doubt that the respondents are liable for Dale's negligence if it was causally connected with Stapley's death. Dale's negligence was not disputed, but it was argued that Stapley's death was not, in any way, a result of Dale's negligence. Dale and Stapley were ordered to "fetch the roof down" and they understood that order to mean: "Do not work under it until you have got it down". But, notwithstanding these orders, after attempts to get the roof down for about half an hour, they decided, after discussion together, that it was safe and that they would go on with their ordinary work. As Dale was a borer and Stapley a breaker, Dale's work took him away from the place in the mine where they had been trying to get the roof down and Stapley's work took him to that place. There was no suggestion that Dale went where he did because of the order, or to report the matter, or to make any further effort to get the roof down. But it is argued that, because the roof fell while Stapley was under it and Dale was not, Stapley's presence alone was the cause of his death. In my*opinion, they were both equally disobeying an order which applied to each of them, and in so doing they were both equally in breach of their duty. Dale's disobedience continued up to the moment of Stapley's death, and I agree with SELLERS, J., that Stapley's death was a result of their decision not to continue their efforts to get the roof down, a decision which was just as much Dale's decision as Stapley's. As VISCOUNT BIRKENHEAD, L.C., said ([1922] 1 A.C. 144) in Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Volute (2):

" . . . the question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt, where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act, that the party secondly negligent . . . might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution."

VISCOUNT BIRKENHEAD, L.C., was there dealing with acts of negligence which were not synchronous, but in the present case the breach of duty by Dale was synchronous with the breach of duty by Stapley and continued up to the moment of Stapley's death, and it seems to me, looking at the matter broadly and on common-sense principles, impossible to say that the acts of Dale and Stapley did not "come so closely together" and were not so closely "mixed up" that Dale's breach of duty could be regarded as not being part of the cause of Stapley's death.
